Mr. DOUGLAS. To state one instance of the use of this fund where I know its use has been exceedingly valuable, and that is in the Moyock swamp region of eastern North Carolina, where some excellent men of my own district are engaged in farming on a large scale. There is a splendid body of land there, but they did not feel that they could go to the expenditure of a very large sum for the benefit of the whole neighborhood, and so they applied to the Government under this appropriation. That survey has been made, and drainage is going on, not at all at the expense of the Government, but upon the plan suggested by the Government and plans given them by the Government, and there will be in the neighborhood of 15,000 or 16,000 acres of splendid land which will be drained at private expense simply in pursuance of the advice given them under this appropriation.

Mr. MANN. And not one acre of which is government land.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not an acre.

Mr. MANN. If the State of North Carolina wants to drain their land, she ought to employ experts. There are just as good drainage experts outside of the Department of Agriculture as there are in. There are vast drainage schemes all over the country being carried into execution all the time. I know of no reason why the Government should walk into North Carolina and tell the people how to drain their lands any more than tell the people about anything else. The State is amply able to employ the proper assistants and experts.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The same argument would apply to a great deal that is in this agriculture bill, would it not?

A MEMBER. All that is in it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Perhaps; but at the same time I do not think anyone will deny the interference of the Government, if it can be so called, has been of the greatest benefit to the country.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, the same argument would not apply to everything in the agriculture bill. Here is a specific proposition to be applied to a particular locality. If you could only raise one thing in one locality, and then you provide the Agriculture Department should investigate it, that would be on similar lines. To study the subject of agriculture throughout the United States where the information is generally available and where it is useful all over the country is one thing, and to study a particular thing, a particular piece of property of particular importance to a certain farmer, for his particular benefit, that is entirely different from the rest of the agriculture bill, and in my opinion obnoxious to good government.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 247. Joint resolution relating to the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln and making the 12th day of February, 1909, a legal holiday, and for other purposes.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed it session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, Office of Public Roads: One director, who shall be a scientist and have charge of all scientific and technical work, $3,000; 1 chief clerk, $1,600; 4 clerks, class 1; 4 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 clerk, $900; 2 laborers, at $600 each; 1 messenger, $600; 1 messenger boy, $360; in all, $16,460.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the words "three thousand dollars," on page 45, line 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order against the words "three thousand dollars," page 45, line 10.

Mr. LEVER. I hope the gentleman will reserve the point of order for a moment.

Mr. MACON. Oh, yes; I will reserve it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, usually I sympathize with the gentleman from Arkansas in his spirit of economy, and I think we all agree that he is doing a good work, but I want to call his attention to the fact that the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads is receiving the smallest salary of any chief in the Department of Agriculture, and to the further fact that the work of the Office of Public Roads is perhaps second in importance to the work of no single bureau in the Department of Agriculture. This is a new bureau. It is doing a great work, the work of educating the people of this country to the great value of good roads and how to make them.

I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that there is a constant drift of population from the country to towns and cities. That drift is due largely to the fact that there is so little means of communication between the people. There is nothing that will turn back that tide from the city to the country so rapidly and certainly as will the building of good roads over which the people must travel. Now, then, let me call the attention of the gentleman to another thing. Until the present chief of the bureau took this position the salary of the chief was $3,000. When this gentleman took charge this salary was reduced to $2,750. This man has never come to members of the Agriculture Committee begging that his salary be increased. I understand that he is a man of wealth, that the salary cuts no figure so far as he is personally concerned; but his salary ought to be commensurate with the great work of the bureau over which he is chief. This is a bureau in which the farmers of this country are especially interested. It reaches the agricultural classes as closely as any bureau of this whole Government, and is calculated to bring as much benefit. It was established for their real interests; and it is doing real, substantial, genuine good throughout the country; and it does seem to me that a salary of $3,000 for the chief of this great bureau is not more than Congress ought to give. I sincerely trust that the gentleman from Arkansas, sympathizing with him as I do in most of his points of order, in the interest of the farmer, in the interest of public road building throughout the country, in the interest of the general good throughout the country, will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I wish to supplement what the gentleman from South Carolina has so well and eloquently said. I wish to appeal to my friend from Arkansas to withdraw the point of order as to the increase of salary of this extremely meritorious public servant. While the gentleman who is Director of the Office of Public Roads may not be dependent upon the salary of the office, he is justly entitled to an increase of salary because of the excellent public service he has rendered. He is a man of character and ability. I would say to my friend from Arkansas that Mr. Page has his heart in this good-roads work, and he is doing a great work for the farmers of this country. The Office of Public Roads, Mr. Chairman, is doing a good work, and there is an increasing demand for the work of this office. As to the value of the work, I remember an interesting debate I had with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] some years ago.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Not at present. It has been suggested that the Office of Public Roads, Mr. Chairman, has for its purpose entering upon a general system of national aid to good roads throughout the country. The present work of the office is more limited. Among other things, it gives advice as to the best methods of constructing roads, the best materials to be used in the construction of roads, and the office is meeting a demand coming up from all over the country for better public roads. It is a work in cooperation with the States and of great value to the whole country.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not wish to interfere with my friend, but I am anxious to get through with this bill to-night.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Only one word more and I will close. Considering the important work of this office, the man who is at the head of it ought to be paid a salary somewhat adequate to the merit of the bureau and of the work that it is doing. Mr. Page is not a man to be insistent upon an increase of salary, but the committee thought the increase just; and in view of the public service Mr. Page is rendering, and his meritorious work, I hope the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] will withdraw his point of order and let the salary be increased this slight amount.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a moment. Other gentlemen have spoken for the proposition. Mr. Chairman, at the time, according to the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, this gentleman's salary was fixed at $2,750 the revenues of the country were exceeding the expenditures; and yet Congress, when that happy condition existed, saw fit to fix his salary at $2,750. Now, when the Government is so conditioned that it is expending something like $150,000,000 a year in excess of its revenues, I do not think it is wise, I do not think it is patriotic, I do not think it is for the best interests of the country to increase it while present conditions exist.

Mr. Chairman, this is a small matter in itself; it is only $250; but when added to the many other proposed increases it would help to make a very large sum. The gentleman being rich, as stated by my friend from South Carolina, will not miss it much himself.

Therefore I can not see the wisdom of insisting that his salary ought to be increased at this particular time. But if this salary alone could be increased and the matter stop at that, I would say let it be increased. But we all know, Mr. Chairman, that by the increase of one salary we set a precedent for the increase of the salaries of all of the other officers and employees of the Government, many of them equally as meritorious as this, and hence there would be no end to the matter. It would soon develop into an endless-chain affair.

Now, a word as to what the gentleman said about good roads: We all know that to fail to increase the salary of this gentleman will not interfere with public-road construction anywhere or with any aid that this bureau is giving to road work.

If so, then this gentleman would be unworthy of the position he holds, and ought not to receive any salary at all. So I know it will cut no figure in the case whatever. I am for the farmers first, last, and all the time. I stand for good roads for the farmers at all times, and I do not like for gentlemen to attempt to put matter in the RECORD that in anywise indicates that I am against the farmer, simply because I oppose the increase of the salaries of the officers and employees of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. POLLARD. I make the point of order that there is nothing before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The common practice has been to reserve points of order. A point of order is reserved. If anybody calls for a ruling from the Chair on the point of order, the Chair will promptly rule.

Mr. POLLARD. I should like to have a ruling, then.

Mr. SCOTT. I call for a ruling on the point of order. I think the gentleman from Arkansas has said all he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that it is conceded that this is an increase of salary?

Mr. LAMB. Before the Chair rules, I should like to make one statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires an answer to the question.

Mr. MANN. It is an increase. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SCOTT. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CARLIN. I did not understand that the point of order was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was made. The Chair will rule when anyone calls for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. I ask permission to make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to make a statement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Page is a Virginian. I know him well. I know his family. He is not a millionaire. I doubt whether he is worth anything financially or not. Of course, that has nothing to do with the point of order, but he has been confounded with another Mr. Page. He is a poor man, I understand.

Mr. LEVER. He is rich in good character and works.

Mr. LAMB. Yes; he is.

Mr. SCOTT. I offer an amendment to restore the present salary.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10, page 45, in lieu of the words stricken out, insert "$2,750."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MACON. I move to strike out the paragraph, and I ask to be heard on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. I am in favor of anything that is in the interest of agriculture. I recognize that upon the agriculturists of this country depends the success and happiness of all human beings who reside within the confines of this Union. I recognize that too much can not be done or said in behalf of that class of people who support the world. I insist, however, that gentlemen have from time to time injected matter into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which, if unexplained, would seem to reflect upon my representation of friendship for and appreciation of the farmers, when I am sure they do not intend it that way. The language of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] a few moments ago would indicate that by objecting to the increase of this salary I was standing in the way of the progress of the construction of public roads, and that, therefore, I stood in the way of the progress of the agricultural interests of this country, when nothing was further from my mind. I insist that I am helping the farmer when I attend each and every session of the House, from the time the gavel falls convening it in the morning until it falls to adjourn it in the evening, and do my very best to strike down every appropriation that I think will eventually bring upon the farmer an extra burden of taxation. If that is working against the farmer, then gentlemen are welcome to make the most of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on that motion.

Mr. MACON. I will withdraw the motion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. I want to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the House to vindicate the correctness of a statement I made a few minutes ago, which was challenged by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. It has no bearing except in the interest of accuracy. In suggesting the propriety of consideration by the Committee on Agriculture of an experiment station in the Canal Zone, I stated that Colonel Goethals had stated to me and in my presence that he believed such a station was important down there. The gentleman from Illinois, as politely as he could and in a parliamentary way, contradicted the statement and said, on the other hand, Colonel Goethals said before the committee recently, in the hearings on the zone, that such an experiment station would be utterly useless and that he was opposed to it.

Now, this is what Colonel Goethals said. He was asked by Mr. HUBBARD, a member of the gentleman's committee:

Have you considered the desirability of the Department of Agriculture establishing an experiment station here?

Colonel GOETHALS. I have always believed it should be done, and the question was taken up about a year and a half ago, and it was learned that such station could not be established without a specific appropriation by Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] should feel that my remarks were intended to put him in a wrong light before the great agricultural interests of this country. The entire purpose and motive of that most eloquent appeal was to have the gentleman withdraw his point of order, and I thought that I had seen the tears melting in the gentleman's eyes and that I had succeeded.

I would not do the gentleman an injustice for anything in the world. I know him too well and I love him too well. I know that he is one of the hardest-worked Members in Congress. I know that he represents his great district as faithfully, and conscientiously, and as earnestly, and as ably as any man on the floor of this House, and I am confident that his heart beats in sympathy with the great agricultural interests of his State, and I am sure that nothing I could have said could have been construed in the light in which the gentleman from Arkansas construes it.

I was trying to get the salary of this Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads raised. I was very anxious that the gentleman from Arkansas should withdraw his point of order. I was very earnest. I was a little doubtful whether the gentleman quite caught the force of the fact that this Bureau of Public Roads was a bureau which touched his people most directly, and I was just calling it to the attention of the gentleman, pressing upon his mind the fact that this was a proposition which involved the great agricultural interests not only of South Carolina, but of Arkansas. Those two States are twin sisters almost, and my friend from Arkansas and I are almost twin brothers in looks and size and in the interest that we take in the great agricultural classes of this country. [Laughter and applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LAWRENCE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On February 9, 1909:

H. R. 26390. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909;

H. R. 11460. An act to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William H. Houck;

H. R. 16015. An act for the relief of Lafayette L. McKnight;

H. R. 15448. An act to amend section 12 of an act entitled "An act to provide for eliminating certain grade crossings on the line of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company in the city of Washington, D. C., and requiring said company to depress and elevate its tracks, and to enable it to relocate parts of its railroad therein, and for other purposes," approved February 12, 1901; and

H. R. 20171. An act to correct the military record of George H. Tracy.

On February 11, 1909:

H. R. 3388. An act for the relief of L. B. Wyatt; and

H. R. 27051. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish one condemned brass or bronze Napoleon gun, carriage, and cannon balls to the State of Iowa.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inquiries in regard to systems of road management throughout the United States and for giving expert advice on this subject, $18,000.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 26, page 45, after the word "dollars," the period and insert a semicolon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of the best methods of road making and the best kinds of road-making materials throughout the United States and for furnishing expert advice on road building and maintenance, $34,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on this paragraph.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 4, the word "thirty-four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "seventy-five."

The CHAIRMAN. Until the point of order reserved by the gentleman from Illinois is disposed of an amendment is not in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the proposition is to double the amount of this expenditure, then I shall have to insist upon the point of order. There is no authority in law for this bureau at all, so far as that is concerned. I believe the whole bureau is subject to a point of order. There is nothing in the organic act that authorizes it, nothing in the law that authorizes it except the appropriation; and while I dislike very much to make a point of order upon the item, if the intention is to have even long debate on the proposition, to increase the item, and then double the amount, I feel that I ought to insist on the point of order and let the item go out.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the threat of the gentleman from Illinois I will withdraw the amendment. I would rather have $34,000 than nothing.

Mr. MANN. Then I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, then I shall reserve the point of order until I know what the amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment can be read except for the information of the House while a point of order is pending.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment read for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the clerk will read the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "States," line 3, page 46, the following: "for cooperating with the Post-Office Department in suggesting methods for maintenance and improvement of rural-road routes."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, this is not an enlargement——

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, the point of order comes too late. I had begun the discussion of the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. I was asking for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize any gentleman to make a point of order when he was on his feet seeking recognition before the debate began. The gentleman from Kansas reserves the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I would like to say a few words in explanation of the amendment, in the hope that the gentleman will withdraw his point of order. This amendment of mine is not an enlargement of the powers of the Office of Public Roads, but simply makes its operation more specific and of more practical benefit to the country. There is no way in which this office can be made of more real benefit to the country than to have it cooperate with the Post-Office Department in suggesting methods for the preservation of the rural-route roads. Frequently rural routes are discontinued on account of bad roads——

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him in order to make a statement?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. When Mr. Page, the Director of the Office of Public Roads, was before the committee, he was asked and testified as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Page, have you ever had any requests from the Post-Office Department for suggestions in the line of improving rural roads?

Mr. PAGE. Yes, sir; we have a regular arrangement with them.

The CHAIRMAN. You have such cooperation in effect now, have you?

Mr. PAGE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you do in that line?

Mr. PAGE. When rural delivery routes are found in such a poor condition that it is impossible at certain seasons of the year to make the deliveries over them, or they are generally bad at all seasons to the extent that makes it very expensive to operate the routes, those facts are reported to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General and he notifies the Office of Public Roads, stating the number of the route, the location, and so forth, and then we send out the blank form to the local authorities having jurisdiction over the particular roads, simply saying that if we can be of any assistance to them to the extent of giving them expert advice, we will be glad to send an expert out to advise with them as to the best method of putting the road in proper condition. It has done a great deal of good in a way; it has spurred up a number of communities to improve their roads.

So the gentlemen will see, therefore, that under the general authority of the provision, as carried in the existing law, such cooperation as he seeks to obtain is already being carried forward. Therefore it seems to me unwise to set out the matter specifically in the appropriation bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Why should the gentleman object to making the authority specific? I feel sure that better and more practical results would obtain if the department and the Office of Good Roads understood that it was expected of them that they should continue this work.

Mr. SCOTT. Evidently the Office of Good Roads understands that now, and I do not want to load up the bill with a lot of unnecessary language.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is a very short amendment, and simply makes the authority clearer. I ask the gentleman to accept it.

Mr. SCOTT. I prefer not. It seems to me so unnecessary, and I do not see why the gentleman should insist on it when he has been shown that it is already being done.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is bad policy to have the department pursuing a course of action which is without authority of law or of doubtful authority, and I think the House has already seen the value of this work and will agree to insert the language in the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. I certainly hope the House will not insert the language in the bill. I therefore insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas insist upon his point of order?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the gentleman from Kansas make a point of order against the paragraph——

Mr. SCOTT. I make the point against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Chair let me call his attention to one fact? This identical point of order was raised at the last session and was overruled by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment seems to the Chair to be a germane amendment which perfects a provision which would be subject to the point of order, and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order; and the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard just for a moment on the amendment. The House has heard the extract from the hearings which I have just read. This extract makes it entirely clear that the cooperation sought to be obtained through this amendment is now being carried on between the Office of Public Roads and the Post-Office Department. I can not see any possible good it accomplishes by inserting this language and no possible reason why it should be incorporated in the bill. If you are going to insert language requiring the Office of Public Roads to cooperate with the Post-Office Department, some other Member might just as well insist on specifically requiring the Office of Public Roads to cooperate with the Department of the Interior or the Department of the Treasury or any other department of the Government. I see no possible advantage in it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Would there be equal authority under the general language now in the bill for cooperation by the Public Roads Office with the Interior Department, as well as the Post-Office Department?

Mr. SCOTT. I think so. I think the general authority would be sufficient to enable the Office of Public Roads to cooperate with any department of the Government.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But the gentleman suggests that fact as an argument against my amendment—the fact that specific authority might be asked for cooperation with other departments. I think it especially imperative that specific authority be given for cooperation with the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SCOTT. It seems to me the reasons are so obvious why the amendment should not be adopted that I do not care to take up any longer time in discussing them.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SHEPPARD) there were—ayes 42, noes 72.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collating, reporting, and illustrating the results of such investigations and experiments and preparing, publishing, and distributing bulletins and reports, $23,000.

Mr. STURGISS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the last section by striking out the last three words. I refer to the paragraph last read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, page 46, strike out "$5,000."

Mr. STURGISS. No; the section just passed.

Line 4, page 46, strike out "$34,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Was the gentleman on his feet seeking recognition before the beginning of the reading of the next paragraph?

Mr. STURGISS. Yes; I was up before the next paragraph was read.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the gentleman's amendment is. Can we have it again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. STURGISS. Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief in what I have to say on this subject. I know there is a difference of opinion between Members of the House on the subject.

I believe the investigations and studies of the subjects embraced in the section proposed to be amended will, if properly conducted, prove of great value in inducing the assumption by the United States, in conjunction with the States, of the work of systematically constructing and maintaining public highways of the highest character in the interest of interstate commerce, of military and post roads, and of the general welfare.

A rapidly growing public sentiment will not much longer tolerate inaction upon this highly important subject by Congress. It is no longer a question of the right and power of Congress to act affirmatively, but solely a question of expediency and wise statesmanship.

On the constitutional right, I desire to incorporate as a part of my remarks the following extracts from a pamphlet printed recently by the National Grange, an organization of farmers in 27 States, with an aggregate membership of nearly 1,000,000 members:

The power vested in Congress to enact such legislation has been clearly established by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in defining the scope of that paragraph in the Constitution reading as follows:

"SEC. 8, par. 3. The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with Indian tribes."

The right of Congress to improve our harbors and waterways, to construct canals, and to regulate the height of bridges spanning rivers, channels, and other waterways lying wholly within the boundaries of a State is based entirely on this paragraph.

The fact that up to the present time Congress has not exercised the right to promote commerce between the States by constructing and improving public highways in the various States, can not be construed as evidence that the power to do so has been abrogated. In the case of County of Mobile v. Kimball (162 U. S., 695), the question was raised as to the right of the State of Alabama to enact a law for certain improvements in the port and river of Mobile, it being contended that such a law was in conflict with the constitutional right of Congress to regulate commerce between the several States. Mr. Justice Field, who delivered the opinion of the court, said:

"Inaction of Congress upon these subjects, unlike inaction upon matters affecting all the States and requiring uniformity of regulation, is not taken as a declaration that nothing shall be done with respect to them, but is rather to be deemed a declaration that for the time being, and until it seems fit to act, they may be regulated by state authority."

In the case of Miller v. The Mayor of New York (109 U. S., 385) it was held that the act of Congress authorizing the building of the Brooklyn Bridge, a structure wholly within the State of New York, was constitutional. The court said:

"Such uniformity has been the construction given to that clause of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power to regulate commerce," citing Pennsylvania v. Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company. (59 U. S., 421.)

In the case of Clinton Bridge (10 Wall., 454) Mr. Justice Nelson, on the authority of the Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company case, held that the act of Congress declaring the Clinton Bridge across the Mississippi River at Clinton, Iowa, a lawful structure and a post route, and prescribing certain regulations for its maintenance, was constitutional. He said:

"The question whether or not it was competent for Congress to interfere and legalize the bridge, under the power to regulate commerce, and whether or not the act put an end to the pending suit, were questions examined and settled in the affirmative in the case already referred to. (Wheeling Bridge case.) The reasons for the conclusions arrived at will be found there and need not be repeated here."

"Several cases have been before this court relating to bridges over navigable waters of the United States in which questions were raised as to the authority by which the bridges could be constructed, the extent to which they would obstruct the free navigation of water, and the right of private party to interfere with their construction and continuance. * * * The power vested in Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, includes the control of the navigable waters of the United States so far as may be necessary to insure their free navigation; and by navigable waters of the United States are meant such as are navigable in fact, and which by themselves, or their connection with other waters form a contiguous channel for commerce with foreign countries or among the States." (The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall., 557.)

"East River is such a navigable water. It enters the harbor of New York and connects it with Long Island Sound. Whatever, therefore, may be necessary to preserve or improve its navigation, the General Government may direct; and to that end it can determine what shall and what shall not be deemed an interference with or an obstruction to such navigation."

Under this case of Miller v. The Mayor of New York it would seem that Congress has the power under the commerce clause not only to construct, improve, and maintain or authorize interstate highways, either by water or by land, but it has power to construct, improve, and maintain any and all public highways by water or by land, which connect with or intersect or lead into such interstate highways.

The case where the matter was fully considered, and the authority of Congress clearly defined, is the case of Luxton v. The North River Bridge Company. (153 U. S., 525.)

In this case, by act of July 11, Congress authorized the incorporation of the North River Bridge Company, and authorized the construction of a bridge across the Hudson River between the States of New York and New Jersey. The third section of this act is as follows:

"That the bridge with its approaches and railroads thereon, constructed under the provisions of this act, shall be a lawful structure and a military and post road, but no toll charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails of the United States, or for the right of way of the United States, postal and telegraph purposes."

The fourth section of the act incorporated the company and gave it the right and power of eminent domain.

The question in the case arose over the right of the corporation to condemn a certain parcel of land in Hoboken for the purposes of the bridge and for a roadway thereto, through commissioners appointed by the circuit court for the purpose. It was claimed that the act was unconstitutional. Mr. Justice Gray, writing the opinion for the court, said:

"The validity of the act of Congress incorporating the North River Bridge Company rests upon principles of constitutional law now established beyond dispute. The Congress of the United States being empowered by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the several States and to pass all laws necessary or proper for the purpose for carrying into execution any of the powers specifically conferred, may make use of any appropriate use to that end.

"Congress, therefore, may create corporations as appropriate means of executing the powers of government—as, for instance, a bank for the purpose of carrying on fiscal operations in the United States or a railroad corporation for the purpose of promoting commerce among the States." (McCullough v. Maryland ,4 Wheat., 316; Osborne v. The Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat., 738; Pacific Railroad Removal cases, 115 U. S., 1–18; California v. Pacific Railroad, 127 U. S., 1–39.)

"Congress has likewise the power, exercised early in this century by successive acts in the case of the Cumberland or National road from the Pacific across the Alleghenies to Ohio, to authorize the construction of a republic highway connecting several States." (See Indiana v. U. S., 148 U. S., 148.)

"And whenever it becomes necessary for the accomplishment of any object within the authority of Congress to exercise the right of eminent domain and take private lands, making just compensation to the owner, Congress may do this with or without a concurrent act of the State in which the land lies." (Van Blocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U. S., 151–154; Cherokee Nation v. Kansas Railroad, 135 U. S., 614–656.)

"From these premises the conclusion seems to be inevitable that although Congress may, if it see fit, and as it has often done, recognize and approve bridges erected by the authority of two States across navigable waters between them, it may, at its discretion, use its sovereign powers, directly or through a corporation created for that purpose, to construct bridges, for the accommodation of interstate commerce by land, as it undoubtedly may to improve the navigation of rivers for the convenience of interstate commerce by water."

Mr. Justice Gray held that the judicial opinions cited in support of the opposite view were not, having regard to the facts of the cases in which they were uttered, of controlling weight. He cites the case of United States v. The Railroad Bridge Company in the circuit court of appeals (6 MacLean, 517), and says that Justice MacLean's dissenting opinion in the Wheeling Bridge Company case is absolutely unsound, and concurs with Mr. Justice Nelson's majority opinion, citing the Clinton Bridge case, Miller v. New York; also Stockton v. Ball, and the N. Y. Railroad Co. (32 Fed., 9); Wm. Ette Bridge v. Hatch (125 U. S., 1), in which case it was decided that Congress might allow the States to construct bridges between States; or, exercising its sovereignty, might construct them itself. Mr. Justice Gray then said:

"In California v. The Pacific Railroad (127 U. S., 1) it was directly adjudged that Congress has authority in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce among the several States, to authorize corporations to construct railroads across the States as well as Territories of the United States, and Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court and referring to the acts of Congress to build railroads across the continent, said:

"'It can not at the present day be doubted that Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the several States, as well as to provide for postal accommodations and military exigencies, had authority to pass these laws. The power to construct or to authorize individuals or corporations to construct national highways and bridges from State to State, is essential to the complete control and regulation of interstate commerce. Without authority in Congress to establish such highways and bridges, it would be without authority to regulate one of the most important adjuncts of commerce. This power in former times was exerted to a very limited extent, the Cumberland or National road being the notable example. Its exertion was but little called for as commerce was then mostly conducted by water and many of our statesmen entertained doubts as to the existence of the power to establish ways of communication by land. But since, in consequence of the expansion of the country, the multiplication of its products, and the invention of railroads and locomotion by steam, land transportation has so vastly increased, a sounder consideration of the subject has prevailed and led to the conclusion that Congress has plenary power over the whole subject.'"

After quoting the above, Mr. Justice Gray said:

"The act of Congress now in question declares the construction of the North River bridge, between the States of New York and New Jersey, to be 'in order to facilitate interstate commerce,' and it makes due provision for the condemnation of land for the construction and maintenance of the bridge and its approaches and for just compensation to the owners, which has been accordingly awarded to the plaintiff in error.

"In the light of the foregoing principles and authorities, the objection made to the constitutionality of this act can not be sustained."

From the above cases and authorities it is clear that under the commerce clause of the Constitution Congress has the power to construct, maintain, improve, and regulate any of the public highways of the United States between the several States, and any public highways leading into or connecting therewith. There is, therefore, no question but that the Currier bill is a constitutional measure.

I have introduced a bill (H. R. 27825) creating a national highways commission, with appropriations that must be supplemented by state, county, and municipal appropriations bearing a fixed ratio to the national grant before the latter can become available, thus stimulating local effort and taxation to the certain betterment of the public highways of the whole country.

Of the wisdom and policy of the preliminary study and investigation of the subjects contemplated in the paragraph proposed to be amended, there can be no doubt. The more extensive and thorough this work is now done the more economical and intelligent will the practical work of constructing and maintaining public highways be done when that work is undertaken, as it will be sooner or later.

In support of the wisdom of undertaking this great work jointly with the several States I desire to incorporate as a part of my remarks an article printed in the National Grange by Edward W. Perry, full of sound common sense, fortified by a convincing array of facts and figures:

American country ways can scarcely be called ways of pleasantness. On the contrary, they are usually crude and dirty, rough and noisy. They waste time, patience and energy, and they spoil the comfort of all who must endure these defects. In dry seasons they are dusty, in wet weather they are little better than canals of mud; and at all times they are needlessly steep and costly.

This is true largely because American highways, like Topsy, "jest growed." Practically all our roads began as mere trails through wilds, were widened a little by the pioneer who lopped off a branch here, a root there and cut down a tree yonder, that his pack animal might squeeze past. Later comers dug up a stump or a stone, now and then, and trimmed down the sharp banks of the stream, because they were using cart or wagon to carry wife and babe and household belongings to their new home in the wilderness.

All these early travelers followed the line of least resistance, so far as they found it without too much searching. Believing that they would not soon go that way again, and used to making light of such difficulties, our sturdy fathers did little more than was necessary to the moment. So many followed that in a few years they found it good to come together, now and then, to make roads, as neighbors in those friendly days used to have logging bees, house raisings, appleparing parties, and quilting bees, and such other meetings for mutual help as might fairly be made an excuse for dance and frolic. To this hour, in many a corner of the land, road making is regarded as a yearly "bee" at which neighbor and friend should swap tobacco and yarns and jests between short spells of work.

But millions who dwell in country places now see that their wagon roads should be made far better than they have ever been, even when at their best. It has at last been seen that the condition of these roads affects the pocketbook of every human being in all the land more directly and materially than it is affected by any other one cause. This will be so while every human being in the land must use products of the American farm, because all these products must be hauled over these thoroughfares from farm to market. The cost of such moving is increased by everything that hinders the easy moving of the wheels by which the products are carried.

More than half of the scores of millions of tons of things taken each year from American farms; practically all of the tens of millions of tons of food required by 70,000,000 people of this country; all the millions of tons of cotton and of wool they eat, and many another thousand tons of other things they want for their health, their comfort or their luxury, must be hauled by animals through dust or sand or mud, up steep grades or over pebbles that make up the first stage or their journey from field to consumer. From this wastefulness no preseat relief is offered, because almost 93 of every 100 miles of American wagon roads are rough and steep, badly drained, and costly.

These truths about our highways were scarcely known to the people as a whole before the Office of Public Roads, a bureau of the Agricultural Department at Washington, gave us, last year, the nearest approach ever made to the precise truth about the condition and the cost of our public highways. This is the more notable because at the end of each of many decades our National Government has given us tomes of copious and most minute information about the number, birth, and color, the work, wages, and wealth of our people; about the size, products, and value of our farms; but never before last year had any administration even an approach to fair support for its efforts to give to the Nation accurate data covering the miles and the character, the annual cost and the existing condition of its country roads, which are as the arteries and the veins through which must flow that commerce which is as the very lifeblood of our prosperity.

Perhaps no more complete nor accurate information about our roads as a whole will be given before the national census shall have covered this field as fully and as accurately as it has covered other great interests of the Nation. That census can not give information that would interest and benefit a larger number of our people, nor serve them more directly and clearly than would such full and exact information as the next national census may properly give about their highways.

From the best data we have it seems that all of the United States, except Alaska and our island possessions, had 2,151,570 miles of wagon roads in the year 1904. Of these only a minute fraction more than 7 per cent were called improved. This betterment was by means of realigning and grading, by draining and bridging, and by surfacing with material intended to make the roads dry and hard at all seasons, therefore easier and more durable than ordinary earthen roads can well be.

Thus it appears that we had, that year, about three-quarters of a mile of wagon road for each square mile of land in the territory mentioned, or about 6 feet of road for every acre of land. For each mile of such road there were 35 people in this country. That is, for each of us there were 151 feet of wagon road of all characters, but less than 10.7 linear feet of improved road per capita. In fact, for each mile of improved roads in the country we had 494.9 people.

In the year 1904 the work done on all these roads was valued at $79,771,418. This equaled $37.07 per mile, or $1.05 per capita of population—2 cents a week for each of us. Many a frugal shopgirl spends as much daily for gum.

Lack of such improvement as our roads need compelled us to pay, in the year 1907, much more than we should have been made to pay for about 196,153,000 tons of farm products, not including any of the many thousands of tons of fruit; of vegetables other than potatoes; none of the millions upon millions of gallons of milk; none of the myriad millions tons of wood, nor any of the other products hauled from field or forest to market. Nor does it include any of the hundreds of thousands of tons of fertilizers and of feed, or lumber, coal and wire, of machinery and other things taken from town to the farm.

We have been told by authorities that the American farmer loads an average of a little more than 2,000 pounds on his wagon and draws it 12 miles, at a cost of $3. This equals 25 cents a ton mile. If we assume that the wagonload is an even 2,000 pounds, and that the cost of hauling will be $2 instead of $3; and if we assume that the 9,404,430 persons in agriculture in this country use half of the products of our farms, and that the other 66,568,350 persons use only the other half of these products, the cost of taking these to market would be $196,153,000.

Many tests have shown that loads may be drawn in wagons over macadam in average condition at a cost only a little more than one-third that of moving like loads over earth roads in ordinary condition. If this is correct, a saving of $130,768,680 might be made in the cost of marketing half our crops of a year if they could be hauled over macadam rather than over common earth roads. That saving would equal $1.72 apiece for us, or much more than all our road work for the year costs.

But macadam roads cost much money. Still it may be that the first cost will concern the American people less than will the question, What will the investment in good roads actually pay us? Of course everybody knows that this Nation can get, at moderate rates of interest, all the money it will spend on improvements which will pay interest and sinking fund if the financing were done honestly.

A saving of $130,768,680 per annum would be enough to pay 4 per cent interest and 2 per cent sinking fund on $2,179,478,000. That would be enough to build 243,000 miles of good macadam, and in nine years such amount could macadamize every mile of road in the land.

In the ten years which ended with 1906 the exports from the United States were, in the main, as shown below:

Industry.	Valuation.	Per cent.
Agricultural	$8,070,764,278	59.13
Forestry	497,823,882	33.65
Manufacturing	3,788,121,805	27.75
Mining	340,945,341	2.50
Fisheries	70,062,102	.51
Miscellaneous	882,219,915	6.46
Total	13,649,937,318	100.00

In view of the fact that more than half of all we exchange for the gold and the manufactures of other nations comes from products of the toil of our farmers, who are only a little more than one for each eight others of our population; in light of the fact that every other industry in this country depends largely, if not wholly, upon our agriculture for its well being, if not for its very existence, it is interesting and instructive to study the figures that tell us what use has been made of the money of the Nation which owes so much to its farmers; what part of the money they have brought into our National Treasury has been spent to benefit the farmer, and what share of those funds have gone mainly to profit those who exploit the farmer.

Department.	Amount.	Per cent.
Agriculture	$47,000,817	0.74
Commerce and Labor	33,266,760	.53
Executive	76,043,944	1.21
Interior	1,659,350,002	26.30
Judicial	68,804,419	1.08
Justice	5,031,456	.08
Legislative	109,939,057	1.74
Navy	760,287,740	12.05
Post-Office	1,302,926,200	20.65
State	50,603,791	.80
Treasury	935,884,880	14.83
War	1,261,102,566	19.99
Total	6,309,742,632	100.00

Agriculture would have had $3,725,900,000 of national moneys to spend for its further improvement and development in these ten years, or almost 80 times as much as it did have, if Congress had devoted to building up the most productive and valuable of our industries money in proportion to the revenue that industry brought to us from foreign sources. In these ten years Congress put $180,537,000 into improvement of rivers and harbors; that is, for each dollar our Congress allowed us out of our own money to help gather information and in other ways aid the work of making good the roads we must use, it gave $6,943.60 to deepen and to light channels and otherwise improve waterways, some of which were known to be of little possible use, and others that have been improved almost wholly for the benefit of certain foreign interests—for transportation combinations that have been publicly charged with using these advantages to depress still further and in time to destroy the shipping business of the very people who paid for such improvements.

This is a peaceful Nation, but in the decade mentioned it spent for war purposes $2,021,390,306, or 43 times as much as was allotted to agriculture. Yet our farms have for generations been our most effective defense against aggressions by other nations. No power dare so war on us as to check the flow of the mighty river of life that flows from America to feed the Old World. Europe could not permit such stoppage and live. A mere threat to do so would insure peace.

Does not justice to the farmer, consideration for the welfare of all consumers, and plain common sense demand that this Nation shall spend to make its wagon roads good at least as much money each year as it shall spend on its waterways? The wagon roads may be kept always open for free use by all the people; the waterways may be monopolized easily for the great transportation interests.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain papers which the gentleman indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Paper tests: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to test such plants as may require tests to ascertain if they be suitable for making paper, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, including rent and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the punctuation be changed as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 4, page 46, after the word "dollars," the period and insert a semicolon; in line 6, same page, after the word "dollars," strike out the period and insert a semicolon; in line 10, same page, after the word "dollars," strike out the period and insert a semicolon.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Paper tests: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to test such plants as may require tests to ascertain if they be suitable for making paper, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, including rent and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will reserve his point of order upon this paragraph. I know, and the House knows, that there is no man in this body who is better advised or who has made a more capable and comprehensive study of the question of paper making than the gentleman from Illinois, and it is upon his profound knowledge of the situation, as well as upon his splendid capacity for research, that I rely in the earnest hope that he will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. Chairman, the provision in this bill, in my humble opinion, as small as the appropriation is, is the most important item in the whole bill. In the last ten years, notwithstanding the momentous problems that have been presented for solution to the Agriculture Committee, they have had no question more far-reaching in its effect upon the people or more drastic in its ultimate drain upon the Treasury of the United States than the question of the conservation of the forests.

I voted with much pleasure for a bill this time that will carry several millions of dollars, for the purpose of purchasing forest reservations. If the hopes of those who would preserve the Appalachian forests are realized we will sooner or later, in my humble opinion, spend a hundred millions of dollars. The denudation of our forests has become an almost tragic question in its effect upon the industries of this country; we are face to face with the exhaustion of our entire available resources of timber in the next forty years. And this condition of affairs is directly attributable to the devastation of the paper mill.

It has been demonstrated beyond any doubt that the flow of the rivers is not affected and even the supply of available timber is not endangered at all by anything like a scientific and careful cutting of timber. The mountains will reforest themselves. It is the paper mill, that cuts everything from a saw log to a pole, that sweeps everything clean before it, that is absolutely destroying our forests and leaving our mountains barren rocks.

It is then absolutely imperatively necessary, Mr. Chairman, that something must be done and done quickly either by the Federal Government or by the ingenuity of science that will supply us with some substitute for wood as a paper pulp. With the invention of your linotype machine, with increase in the size of your papers, in the multiplicity of your books, and with the multiplying of the various industrial uses to which paper is put, the paper mill will, inside of the next thirty years, literally devour the forests. For that reason this appropriation is placed in this bill. The investigations of the department have already furnished hope to every man who is deeply interested in this question. I can say without the fear of successful contradiction that this question has been already solved, not finally, not in all its details, but the alert scientists in the Department of Agriculture have made a discovery second in beneficence to none other made in the last decade. They have found a substitute for wood that is better than wood in the making of the finest papers, and they have found that substitute after searching up and down the shores of oceans for swamp and sea-island grasses, in forests, and in tropical regions for everything that contains a fiber. At last they found it at the farmer's door, in the shape of a cornstalk.

Mr. SHEPPARD. And the cotton stalk also, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. STANLEY. With characteristic alertness the gentleman presents the claims of the South.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, there are few Members of this House who do not appreciate the conservatism, the ability, and the diligence of Doctor Galloway. Notwithstanding the criticisms that we have heard of various officers connected with the Agricultural Department, I have yet to hear the first word in disparagement, the first expression that does not accord with the opinion I have expressed of this able and efficient scientist. [Applause.]

I want to call the attention of this House to this strong statement of Doctor Galloway with respect to the character of paper which can be manufactured from corn stalks:

HEARINGS AGRICULTURAL COMMITTEE, PAGES 81 AND 82.

Mr. GALLOWAY. Ton for ton the amount of pulp from the cornstalks is just about the same as from wood, but the pulp from the cornstalks is of a finer grade and better quality than that of the ordinary wood pulp. In fact, it is so fine that it could be used to a considerable extent for additions to very cheap woods which are not now available for wood pulp. That is the idea that is being developed by the forest service; that is, in addition to using the cornstalk material directly for paper, it could be utilized for supporting or building up the cells of wood fiber of very cheap woods which are not now used for pulp.

Mr. POLLARD. Then the paper made from cornstalks is of better quality than that made from wood?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Our samples show that you can make all grades of paper, from fine vellum paper down to thin tissue paper suitable for wrapping butter and things of that kind.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does it make good writing paper?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Yes.

* * * * * * *

Mr. COOK. I wanted to ask the doctor this: Do I understand that the same quality of paper as that known as print paper or white paper can be made from cornstalks just as it is made from white spruce?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Not only that, but very much finer paper can be made from the cornstalks than is possible to be made from the wood pulp?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Yes, sir.

Now, your cornstalk will make as much pulp as your wood. It will make a finer paper than your wood, and in making your paper from your cornstalks by an improved process it has been demonstrated by a perfect chemical analysis that you do not lose any of the food value of the cornstalk.

By the manner in which it is treated, the glucose and the proteid matter that furnish the food and bone to the animal from the fodder are all preserved. It is estimated by the department that if a mill were erected for this purpose they could to-day pay $5 a ton for the cornstalks and, estimating the fiber at $45 to the ton, they could manufacture paper now at a profit.

In addition to its value as a paper-making material, this by-product will sell for an equal amount—i. e., $5 to the ton. You have passed from the devastation of the paper mills to the culture of the corn fields, and wherever you can get corn and coal in propinquity, you are saving your forests, you are saving the Treasury, and you are helping the one man who maintains no lobby, who has no organization, seldom reaches the seats of the mighty; the man literally behind the plow, because he is the man who raises the corn. [Loud applause.] If I had time I could show you where Doctor Cobb, Mr. Sutermeister, where every single solitary expert called upon to testify before the committee employed by this Government agrees with this gentleman whom I have quoted here, not in a theory, but in the success of a practical demonstration. It may be asked: "Why then do not the paper mills take this matter up?" Doctor Cobb, who is now in the employ of the Department of Agriculture, who is a man of capacity, has ably and fully answered that question in a reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. CHAIRMAN. If you can send samples of different plants to paper mills which have laboratories for them to experiment with and report to you, why is not that the most satisfactory way of doing it?

Mr. COBB. It is, provided they have the proper facilities; but I find that, while they have the very best facilities for ascertaining the cost commercially of the different articles which they habitually use, outside of that range their fund of information is very small.

The CHAIRMAN. There are only a few that would have them, probably.

Mr. COBB. Very few indeed, I assure you. Experimental work is a very expensive thing. No matter how you try to save, if you get at results you have to spend money, and these people are simply making money, and they do not divert very much of it to experiment work. You can not blame them. (Bulletin No. 35, Hearings, pages 2728 and 2829.)

And this is the statement not only of an able and learned scientist but a practical paper maker. He has had experience in Australia and in America, and he says it is because the paper mills are looking at it from the view point of the manufacturer, indifferent to the producer, and as long as they can manufacture paper at a profit at all out of wood they will continue without chemists, without laboratories, without improvements, seeking no new substitute until the forests are destroyed and necessity spurs on invention.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist upon the point of order?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order. Does the Chair desire that I shall address myself to the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman if he desires to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to test "by cultivation the value of such plants as may require tests." Last year, when the item that was in the bill on this subject went out on a point of order, I offered an amendment, which was subsequently agreed to, and which passed the scrutiny of the point of order, into the language of the act. Now, the item in the bill authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture "to test such plants as may require tests to ascertain if they be suitable for paper making." The authority of the Secretary of Agriculture in the organic act is to "test by cultivation" such plants. The item in the bill authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to operate a paper mill. In fact, that is what has been done. It is not authorized by law at all, and it seems to be not in accordance with the organic act. I would be perfectly willing if I could give to the Secretary of Agriculture authority through the Forestry Service to test different woods separately for the purpose of ascertaining whether they could be made into ground wood and either sulphide or soda fiber. Still, that is not the amendment; and that amendment would be subject to the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I remember that on February 4 the gentleman offered his amendment, which is in the exact language of the bill, I think—

For tests of such plants as may require tests to ascertain if they be suitable for paper making, $10,000.

Now the bill reads:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to test such plants as may require tests so as to ascertain if they be suitable for making paper, $10,000.

Mr. MANN. And I would further say to the gentleman that when I offered that amendment I stated I thought it was not subject to the point of order, because it was based on tests, supposing at the time that the provision of the bill was a copy of the amendment which I offered last year. But upon examination I found that the amendment was changed, I suppose in the Senate or in conference, broadening it very materially, and that the amendment that I offered the other day in the form that it was offered was not then subject to the point of order, although it was not in the form of the amendment that was agreed to before.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to discuss this matter. I think we ought to get this cleared a little.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly on the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want, first, to get some information of the gentleman from Illinois. Now, the amendment that a few days ago was adopted reads this way:

Paper tests: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to test such plants as may require tests to ascertain if they be desirable for paper making.

That was adopted by 41 ayes, 23 noes. That took the place of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Now, I got the impression from what was said, when that was adopted, that it was not the same thing as the provision that is now before the committee. I further labored under the impression that there would be no point of order raised to this. I wanted then to offer an amendment, and did so, but withdrew it to offer it now as being a better place for it to come in. Now, when the time comes to consider this pending paragraph a point of order is made, and it is about to go out. I must shift my sails. I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether or not he thinks the amendment that I have just read covers the same subject and is as elastic as the provision that is now in this bill?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the amendment that was adopted the other day, so far as that matter was concerned, was clearly subject to a point of order, but it was finally adopted. This is a different amendment. It provides for running a paper mill.

Mr. STANLEY. With the indulgence of the gentleman from Illinois, I think he has confounded the provisions of a bill that has been favorably reported from the committee, appropriating $30,000 for the purpose of erecting a paper mill, with the provisions of this act; and it is not characteristic of the gentleman to confound anything.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I was not referring to his amendment. I was just going to ask him to what item in the bill it is offered.

Mr. STANLEY. I offered no amendment, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman gave notice of offering an amendment.

Mr. STANLEY. I will not offer any amendment, if the gentleman will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman does not propose to offer an amendment, I would like to withdraw the point of order and offer an amendment myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his point of order.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Kentucky does not offer an amendment.

Mr. STANLEY. I will not offer any amendment.

Mr. MANN. I will withdraw the point of order and offer an amendment to insert, after the word "plants," in line 17, the words "and woods."

Insert in line 17, after the word "plants," the words "and woods."

Mr. SCOTT. I have no objection to that amendment, and hope it will prevail.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk began the reading of the next paragraph of the bill,

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, one moment.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph has not been finished.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before we leave that paper paragraph I want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Was the gentleman on his feet attempting to get recognition before the Clerk began the reading of the next paragraph?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was trying to get on my feet. I was not exactly "on my feet," Mr. Chairman. I was about halfway up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the gentleman brings himself within the rule. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to permit employees of the Department of Agriculture to make assignments of their pay, under such regulations as he may prescribe, during such time as they may be in the employ of the said department.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order against the last paragraph, which is clearly legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. SCOTT. I concede that the point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. BOUTELL] may have fifteen minutes time in which to address the House on Abraham Lincoln.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, for this courtesy in permitting me to address the committee at this time, I thank the Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois, and the committee.

When the roll of this House was called at the opening of the Thirtieth Congress, on December 6, 1847, among the new Members who answered to their names was Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois. In this Congress John Quincy Adams, Robert C. Winthrop, Andrew Johnson, and Hannibal Hamlin were among his colleagues, while Stephen A. Douglas and Jefferson Davis were serving in the Senate. Here in this House, attending to its routine duties and responding to numerous roll calls, Lincoln spent his fortieth birthday. When his service as a Representative ended three weeks later, no one of his associates had marked the obscure Member from the West for higher honors. A little more than sixteen years later, when the roll of the immortals was called in the Congress of those whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, whose dominion endureth throughout all generations, Abraham Lincoln answered "Present." [Applause.]

To-morrow the one hundredth anniversary of Lincoln's birth will be generally observed, and tributes in many tongues will be paid to his character and works. It is altogether fitting that at this time we should place upon our records some memorial of the greatest Member of this National Assembly of the people's representatives. Others will tell the story of his life, the marvel of his deeds, and the miracle of his eloquence. Let us, in this presence where he once moved, recall the shining example of charity and magnanimity that Lincoln set for all those who are called to discharge the grave responsibilities of exalted office. No ruler ever faced so hard a task or one beset with so many pitfalls as that which confronted Lincoln when he entered upon the Presidency. During all his term of service he had to deal not only with open enemies, but with secret foes, faithless friends, and unscrupulous rivals. Each day brought its consuming labors, its message of disaster in the field, or report of treachery at home, the abuse of hostile critics, or the censure of misguided adherents. But through all those dark years, though often the iron entered deep into his soul, no word of bitterness or reproach ever fell from Lincoln's lips.

Through the long leaden days he endured the whips and scorns of time with unfailing patience and serenity, sometimes diverting the force of the heaviest blows with the shield of humor; and day after day he bore without a murmur a load of care that would have crushed a spirit that had not been nobly consecrated. But, in the night watches, when deep sleep falleth upon men, he trod alone the loftiest heights of human thought, communed in solitude with God, drank deep from the cool cisterns of Christian charity, and came back to the burdens and the heat of another day with his soul purged of all envy, hatred and malice, and all uncharitableness, and with the light of inspiration in his deep-set eyes. We shall search in vain the messages, speeches, and letters of Lincoln, for one impatient, harsh, or contemptuous word directed against those who differed with him, or sought to thwart his designs.

The war powers vested in Lincoln gave him the influence of a dictator, and yet he never used this authority to destroy or humiliate a personal enemy, or a political rival. By the weak and the thoughtless, in all ages, the jarring din of rough words of censure, and even the strident clamor of vituperation and abuse, when emanating from those intrusted with transitory power, are often accounted signs of energy, strength, and courage; but the wise and observing know that it is the shallow streams which are boisterous and which roar loudly.

Lincoln was as far above resenting an opinion that differed from his own as he was above boasting of his feats of strength. His was that rarest magnanimity akin to the charity which "vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up." Lincoln possessed a certain largeness of nature, that developed during his later years into a nobility of spirit of heroic type, which enabled him to regard those who sneered and scoffed at his political leadership with the same naïve good nature with which, in his youth, he was wont to look down from his rugged tower of strength upon his physical antagonists. Political history records no act of magnanimity equal to that of Lincoln's in elevating to the highest appointive office in the land one whose preeminent fitness for the Chief Justiceship he could still recognize, although Chase had deserted his Cabinet and had sought by undermining his influence to succeed him as President.

And when the great conflict was ended Lincoln had only words of kindness and welcome for those who had taken arms against the Government; and for the stricken South he cherished naught but feelings of tender compassion and brotherly affection. [Applause.] With a charity that was all embracing he absolved his bitterest enemies from all malice and his unstable friends from all baseness.

If, as has been said, a foreign nation is a kind of contemporaneous posterity, England's contemporary opinion of Lincoln may be taken as part of posterity's tribute. For four years London Punch had tried, through the pencil of Teniel and the pen of Taylor, to belittle and ridicule Lincoln and the cause for which he stood. But when the end came this journal made honorable amends in the noble engraving of Teniel representing Britannia joining with Columbia in mourning for the dead President, while Tom Taylor gave expression to the grief of the English people in these lines:

You lay a wreath on murdered Lincoln's bier;
You, who with mocking pencil wont to trace,
Broad for the self-complacent British sneer,
His length of shambling limb, his furrowed face,

His gaunt, gnarled hands, his unkempt, bristling hair,
His garb uncouth, his bearing ill at ease,
His lack of all we prize as debonair—
Of power or will to shine, of art to please.

You whose smart pen backed up the pencil's laugh,
Judging each step, as though the way were plain;
Reckless, so it could point its paragraph
Of chief's perplexity or people's pain.

Beside this corpse, that bears for winding sheet
The Stars and Stripes, he lived to rear anew.
Between the mourners at his head and feet,
Say, scurril-jester, is there room for you?

Yes, he had lived to shame me from my sneer,
To lame my pencil, and confute my pen—
To make me own this hind of princes peer,
This rail splitter a true-born king of men.

My shallow judgment I had learnt to rue,
Noting how to occasion's height he rose,
How his quaint wit made home truth seem more true;
How, iron like, his temper grew by blows;

How humble yet how hopeful he could be;
How in good fortune and in ill the same;
Nor bitter in success, nor boastful he,
Thirsty for gold, nor feverish for fame.

He went about his work—such work as few
Ever had laid on head and heart and hand—
As one who knows, where there's a task to do,
Man's honest will must Heaven's good grace command;

Who trusts the strength will with the burden grow;
That God makes instruments to work his will
If but that will we can arrive to know,
Nor tamper with the weights of good and ill.

So he went forth to battle, on the side
That he felt clear was Liberty's and Right's,
As in his peasant boyhood he had plied
His warfare with rude Nature's thwarting mights—

The uncleared forest, the unbroken soil,
The iron-bark that turns the lumberer's ax,
The rapid that o'erbears the boatman's toil,
The prairie, hiding the mazed wanderer's tracks;

The ambushed Indian, and the prowling bear—
Such were the needs that helped his youth to train.
Rough culture—but such trees large fruit may bear,
If but their stocks be of right girth and grain.

So he grew up, a destined work to do,
And lived to do it four long-suffering years!
Ill-fate, ill-feeling, ill-report lived through,
And then he heard the hisses change to cheers,

The taunts to tribute, the abuse to praise,
And took both with the same unwavering mood;
Till, as he came on light, from darkling days,
And seemed to touch the goal from where he stood,

A felon hand, between the goal and him,
Reached from behind his back, a trigger prest—
And those perplexed and patient eyes were dim,
Those gaunt, long-laboring limbs were laid to rest!

The words of mercy were upon his lips,
Forgiveness in his heart and on his pen,
When this vile murderer brought swift eclipse
To thoughts of peace on earth, good will to men.

The Old World and the New, from sea to sea,
Utter one voice of sympathy and shame!
Sore heart, so stopped when it at last beat high;
Sad life, cut short just as its triumph came.

A deed accurst! Strokes have been struck before
By the assassin's hand, whereof men doubt
If more of horror or disgrace they bore;
But thy foul crime, like Cain's, stands darkly out.

Vile hand, that brandest murder on a strife,
Whate'er its grounds, stoutly and nobly striven;
And with the martyr's crown crownest a life
With much to praise, little to be forgiven!

I believe that the time has now come when we can view Lincoln and his works in their true perspective, and that the universal verdict will be that among the world's greatest men, for moral elevation and pure nobility of spirit, Abraham Lincoln had no peer. There is no one living to-day who has in his heart any thought of Lincoln but that of tender reverence. And the influence of that strong, pure spirit will be eternal, for he is one of those of whom the Hebrew prophet spake:

And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Did not the last paragraph go out on a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. It has gone out.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I desire to offer an amendment as an additional paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph the following:
"And it is hereby declared that it is the intention of this act that no money herein appropriated shall be paid to any person to discover or devise any patentable process for making paper for his exclusive use, benefit, or ownership, or otherwise than for the United States and the people thereof."

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order. I may say to the gentleman that I understand that in the Agricultural Department every one engaged in this or other scientific work is required in advance to agree to turn over any patent if obtained to the Government for public use.

Mr. SCOTT. I make the point of order and insist upon a ruling now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I do not think it is subject to a point of order and I will discuss that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee on the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on February 24, 1896, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was considering a paragraph in the Indian appropriation bill when Mr. Linton offered this amendment, which is in the exact words I have sent up to the desk:

It is hereby declared that it is the intention of this act that no money herein appropriated shall be paid for the education in sectarian schools—

And so forth.

That was held in order by the Chairman, Mr. PAYNE. It is clearly a limitation, Mr. Chairman. Now, while the Chair is looking that up I will discuss the merits of this matter. I am quite familiar with the regulation.

Mr. SCOTT. I am very sorry, but I must object to a discussion of the merits of the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to say anything more on the point of order?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SCOTT. It seems to me clear that the amendment proposed is legislation, because, as I understood it, it applies not only to this appropriation bill, but any future act of appropriation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. On the contrary, it is just the other way.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I misunderstood it; but it is a matter of legislation not within the province of the committee at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it is simply a limitation on the appropriation in the bill, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I contend that there is no law on this subject. I defy any Member of the House to cite any law on the statute book that compels an employee, except in the Patent Office, to surrender himself, to turn over any discovery that he may make anywhere, to the United States. The department made a rule by which the employees of the Agricultural Department are coerced into going to the department's legal official and taking out a patent in his name, agreeing in that patent that the people of the United States and the Government may use it; but he can not be compelled to do so, and he can sell it in foreign lands under this rule.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, the gentleman would not allow me to discuss the merits, but I will yield; I can not be ungracious.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the gentleman will not reproach me for ungraciousness in objecting to his discussing the matter on its merits. I simply want to say to the gentleman that I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have some objection to the amendment. I would have no objection to this amendment if it accomplished the purpose which the gentleman from Tennessee seeks to accomplish, but as I heard the amendment read, and as I look at it, it does not accomplish the purpose at all.

We all know that if a discovery is made with reference to paper making somebody will apply for a patent, and probably somebody will obtain a patent for it. Under existing regulations in the Department of Agriculture, if an official of that department makes investigation and discovery and applies for a patent, the patent is turned over to the public without any benefit to the person who obtained it. Application is made to the Patent Office, the patent is obtained, and everybody has a right to use the patent. But this amendment forbids a man who makes a discovery from applying for a patent, and what will be the result? Somebody else will claim that he made the discovery. There will be another application by some one else at the Patent Office and there will be a question as to who made the discovery.

There will be an application before the Patent Office by some private person, a patent will be granted to the private person, and then, of course, the question can be raised in court as to whether the person who owns the patent is entitled to the patent as the original discoverer, but that becomes a matter of evidence, a matter of litigation for years, and the gentleman from Tennessee will note this in his proposed amendment:

Paid to any person to discover or revise any patentable process for making paper for his exclusive use, benefit, or ownership, otherwise—

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Otherwise than for the benefit of the people of the United States.

Mr. MANN. I understand. Then there is no authority in the Patent Office to grant a patent for the benefit of the people of the United States. The patent under the law is granted for the benefit of the man who receives the patent, and under this amendment the man who makes the discovery can not make an application for a patent, can not receive a patent, and some one outside will come along and do it. There is always a dispute as to who makes a discovery. If we make a discovery in the little testing machine they have down here, that is a matter of public information. If no patent is granted there, some one comes in and claims that he has made that discovery, whereas if we make a discovery and apply for a patent the prior rights of the United States and the people thereof are absolutely secure, but if the gentleman's amendment prevails, instead of preserving the people from the monopoly of this patent it will turn the discoveries of paper making over to some paper-manufacturing concern.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied if the distinguished gentleman from Illinois will read the report of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor——

Mr. MANN. Which the gentleman has already done.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee (continuing). He will find that there is no law, except in the Patent Office, that prevents an employee of the Department of Agriculture or any other department from making a discovery and patenting it, and although we may have rules and rules as we please, yet that employee can walk out to the Patent Office the next morning and patent it, or go to London or to Canada and do so.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman understand that these men in the Agricultural Department are required to enter into a contract——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have been trying to discuss that, but have been interrupted. That is a rule. It is not a law. If I am an employee of the Agricultural Department to-morrow, and I discover a patent, I can walk out of the Patent Office and patent it, Secretary Wilson's good rule to the contrary notwithstanding, because it is but a rule.

Mr. MANN. It is a contract that they enter into.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is a rule; it is not a law.

Mr. MANN. I understand they are required to enter into a contract.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They have no right to do that, and the employee can go out and patent his discovery because there is no law to prohibit his getting a patent for paper making and selling it to whom he pleases—the paper trust, perhaps. That is exactly the slip-gap that I am trying to close up. If the gentleman can amend my amendment, I will be perfectly satisfied. It is a limitation. If I could legislate in this bill, I would cover the whole trouble.

Mr. MANN. I have not anything in my head now that will cover the case.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I have, and I offered it a few days ago, and it was to the effect "that all discoveries for the making of paper in the Department of Agriculture shall be patented in the name of the Secretary of Agriculture for the use and benefit of the people of the United States." If the gentleman will agree to that I will be perfectly willing to substitute it for the amendment that I have offered.

Mr. MANN. I will have no objection to that.

Mr. SCOTT. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer as a substitute for the amendment that I offered the following, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to joint resolution (H. J. Res. 219) to accept the gift of Constitution Island, in the Hudson River, New York, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. du PONT, and Mr. FOSTER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6252) to promote the administration of justice in the navy.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pending amendment will be withdrawn; and the gentleman from Tennessee now offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after line 8, page 47:

"That all discoveries in making paper by the Department of Agriculture shall be patented in the name of the Secretary of Agriculture for the use and benefit of the United States and the people thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment with a favorable recommendation to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. CURRIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 27053), the agricultural appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the vote will be taken on the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL of Iowa, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 28059) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second times and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and, with the accompanying report (H. Rept. No. 2131), ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

LINCOLN'S GETTYSBURG ADDRESS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, it shall be in order for the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague [Mr. BOUTELL], to read President Lincoln's Gettysburg Address.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, it shall be in order for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] to read President Lincoln's Gettysburg Address. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

AMENDING LAWS OF UNITED STATES RELATING TO THE REGISTRATION OF TRADE-MARKS.

Mr. LAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3969.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 3969) to amend the laws of the United States relating to the registration of trade-marks.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act of February 20, 1905, and section 1 of the act of May 4, 1906, be, and the same are hereby, amended so that the sections shall, respectively, read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the application prescribed in the foregoing section, in order to create any right whatever in favor of the party filing it, must be accompanied by a written declaration verified by the applicant, or by a member of the firm or an officer of the corporation or association applying, to the effect that the applicant believes himself or the firm, corporation, or association in whose behalf he makes the application to be the owner of the trade-mark sought to be registered, and that no other person, firm, corporation, or association, to the best of the applicant's knowledge and belief, has the right to use such trade-mark in the United States, either in the identical form or in such near resemblance thereto as might be calculated to deceive; that such trade-mark is used in commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, or with Indian tribes, and that the description and drawing presented truly represent the trade-mark sought to be registered. If the applicant resides or is located in a foreign country, the statement required shall, in addition to the foregoing, set forth that the trade-mark has been registered by the applicant, or that an application for the registration thereof has been filed by him in the foreign country in which he resides or is located, and shall give the date of such registration, or the application therefor, as the case may be, except that in the application in such cases it shall not be necessary to state that the mark has been used in commerce with the United States or among the States thereof. The verification required by this section may be made before any person within the United States authorized by law to administer oaths, or, when the applicant resides in a foreign country, before any minister, chargé d'affaires, consul, or commercial agent holding commission under the Government of the United States, or before any notary public, judge, or magistrate having an official seal and authorized to administer oaths in the foreign country in which the applicant may be, whose authority shall be proved by a certificate of a diplomatic or consular officer of the United States."

"SEC. 1. That the owner of a trade-mark used in commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, or with Indian tribes, provided such owner shall be domiciled within the territory of the United States, or resides in or is located in any foreign country which, by treaty, convention, or law, affords similar privileges to the citizens of the United States, may obtain registration for such trade-mark by complying with the following requirements: First, by filing in the Patent Office an application therefor, in writing, addressed to the Commissioner of Patents, signed by the applicant, specifying his name, domicile, location, and citizenship; the class of merchandise and the particular description of goods comprised in such class to which the trade-mark is appropriated; a statement of the mode in which the same is applied and affixed to goods, and the length of time during which the trade-mark has been used; a description of the trade-mark itself shall be included, if desired by the applicant or required by the commissioner, provided such description is of a character to meet the approval of the commissioner. With this statement shall be filed a drawing of the trade-mark, signed by the applicant, or his attorney, and such number of specimens of the trade-mark as actually used as may be required by the Commissioner of Patents. Second, by paying into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $10, and otherwise complying with the requirements of this act and such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Patents."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does this bill do?

Mr. LAW. Mr. Speaker, it is proposed to amend section 2 of the trade-mark act of February 20, 1905, by omitting the word "such," line 7, page 2, of the bill, before the word "use," and by inserting after the word "use" the words "such trade-mark in the United States." Now, the effect of this amendment will simply be that the declaration—which by this act must accompany the application for trade-mark registration—must state that—

No other person, firm, corporation, or association, to the best of the applicant's knowledge and belief has the right to use such trade-mark in the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is this a unanimous report of the Committee on Patents?

Mr. LAW. It is a unanimous report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 9295. An act in relation to the salary of the Secretary of State.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 7862) to extend the privileges of the first section of the act of June 10, 1880, to the subports of Blaine and Sumas, in the State of Washington, allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the compensation of the deputy collectors at Seattle and Tacoma.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the message of the President of January 4, relative to the International Sportsman Exhibition at Vienna, be taken from the Committee on Military Affairs and referred to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the matter referred to shall be changed from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions. Is there objection?

Mr. PERKINS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I must object. The reference was wrong, but the wrong will not be corrected by committing another wrong. All bills with reference to these international expositions are sent, and should be sent, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. This reference to the Vienna Exposition, I think I do not go too far in saying, was, I think, made inadvertently, and as the motion now made is to send it to another committee which has no jurisdiction, I feel bound to object.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will reserve the right to object. I think the gentleman thinks this is on all fours with another question with which it is not on all fours.

Mr. PERKINS. I will reserve the right to object if the gentleman desires to make a statement.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this was a message of the President recommending an appropriation. Under the rules no bill carrying an appropriation can be referred to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions. It is clearly the intent of the rule that all propositions, except such as actually contain appropriation clauses dealing with industrial arts and expositions, shall be referred to our committee. In fact, that has been almost the universal practice in the past. It was so in the case of the Tokyo Exposition bill last year, the Milan Exposition bill, and, I think, in the case of the Liege Exposition bill a few years ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I object. If the Chair will allow me a moment, I will say that the gentleman is wrong in reference to the procedure of the House. In this very session the Speaker sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that committee has reported it, and it is now before the House for action, a bill directing the representation of the Government at the exposition to be held in Brussels.

There could be no possible distinction between this and the other. Indeed, I should be entirely willing to submit this question of jurisdiction to the judgment of those by whom it was recently passed, because the jurisdiction of an exposition, at which this Government is represented, held by any foreign power, necessarily is the result of negotiations between this Government and the foreign power and the result of consent on the part of the foreign power, and that the jurisdiction of that belongs to the Committee on Foreign Affairs is, Mr. Speaker, entirely clear; and for that reason I must object to the change now asked.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Would the gentleman withhold his objection for one minute?

Mr. PERKINS. Surely.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly proper that the Senate bill amending the act for the Tokyo Exposition, and carrying an appropriation, should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs under the rules.

I have in my hand the report of the gentleman's committee on the Brussels Exposition, and I had intended to ask unanimous consent to recommit that as well. Those two questions of the Brussels Exposition and the Vienna Exposition must go on all fours. They do not go on all fours with the Senate bill amending the Tokyo Exposition act, because that is an act carrying an appropriation, and the reference made by the Chair was perfectly correct so far as that measure is concerned. I think the reference made by the Chair was an oversight in the case of these two particular bills in view of the fact that the rule says that matters relating to industrial arts and expositions, except as relating to appropriations, shall go to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions. In other words, when the bill——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Does the gentleman understand that this exposition at Vienna is either industrial arts or expositions? Is it not more for hunting and the training of hounds?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The word "industrial" qualifies "arts," but not "expositions." The meaning of the rule obviously gives us jurisdiction in matters "relating to industrial arts and to expositions." If the gentleman insists on his objection——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not object. I am perfectiy willing for any committee to have it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill (H. R. 26916) making appropriations for the support of the Indian Department for the coming fiscal year. And pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all of to-morrow may be devoted to general debate, and I want to state in that connection that I have already received applications for time amounting to more than six hours. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], the ranking Democratic Member, tells me that he has received applications for several hours of time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. About six hours.

Mr. SHERMAN. Six hours of time; and so, without wishing to limit the time for debate definitely, I would like that all of to-morrow, at least, be given to general debate, and that the time be equally divided between the two sides and be in control of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] and the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs or the ranking Republican Member present.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I did not understand whether that was the motion or not. I did not quite catch it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] asks unanimous consent that all of to-morrow be given to general debate on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I will have to object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not mean to try to displace the Pension Committee, but I meant so much of the time as we have to-morrow, so the gentleman will understand that we do not intend to take the bill up for reading under the five-minute rule to-morrow. That is all.

Mr. MANN. Subject to the consideration of the pension bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean subject to consideration of the regular order to-morrow.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER CANAL.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I wish the privilege of making a statement. I do not want to object. But there is a statement in the nature of a personal-privilege proposition that I would like to make, and I would like to have unanimous consent to make that statement with reference to the passage of the bill that passed this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent, pending the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], to address the House.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent just to make a statement in reference to a bill that will involve the reading of two pages.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the House that, being a member of the Committee on Railways and Canals, there was referred to that committee the bill H. R. 24853. A brief hearing was heard on that bill and it was voted to report the bill by the majority of the committee, there being only one vote, that of myself, against it. My ignorance, perhaps, of parliamentary procedure had led me to expect something further; at least that I would be notified when the bill would be called up. This morning I was required to make a call on a government department and did not reach the House till about fifteen minutes after Congress convened. Before I reached the House that bill was called up and the committee in charge of it discharged, and a Senate bill of exactly the same purport was taken up and passed by unanimous consent. The Senate bill also had been referred to the same committee, but, I think, had never been presented to the committee. To the House bill I had prepared a minority report, which I desire to place in the RECORD. I intended to have opposed the bill unless it had been amended in the particulars specified in my minority report, which I read, together with the proposed amendments, as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned members of the Committee on Railways and Canals, to which was referred the bill H. R. 24853, dissent from the favorable report directed by the majority of the committee and beg leave to submit the following:

As in part embodying our views, we incorporate the minority report filed by Hon. JOHN L. BURNETT and Hon. T. B. DAVIS, with the report of the majority upon H. R. 14396, made to the Fifty-ninth Congress, which is as follows:

We, the undersigned members of the Committee on Railways and Canals, to which was referred the bill H. R. 5759, dissent from the favorable report directed by a majority of the committee, and beg leave to submit the following as our views thereon:

We believe that the policy of going to Congerss for a charter and for the large rights and powers granted by this bill is vicious in the extreme. All the rights and powers which ought to be conferred on this proposed corporation can be obtained under the laws of Pennsylvania and Ohio. It is claimed by the advocates of the bill that the fact that this is a federal charter will the better enable its promoters to float the bonds in the markets of the world. This we can not believe is the real purpose of the bill, but rather that it is to enable this corporation to escape, as far as possible, state control and regulation, privilege or franchise tax, and to obtain larger powers than can or ought to be conferred upon it by the laws of these States.

Congress has in several instances granted charters to railroad, bridge, and national park companies, and has conferred upon them the right of eminent domain, and these have been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. But such charters have been supported on the ground of some governmental need. We respectfully submit that there is no governmental necessity for permitting this corporation to confiscate the property of another, or the highway of a State, county, or municipality, merely to provide for the construction of another highway of no higher or greater importance than the one destroyed.

For instance, under this charter all the water of a stream, lake, or other body of water which may be running an electrical or gas plant to furnish lights for a city may be consumed by this canal company and the city left in darkness because that plant is run by a private corporation. Now, what federal governmental necessity is there for giving this canal company such power?

Again, if necessary, a stream may be entirely absorbed under this charter, and mills and other plants below entirely destroyed to suit the purposes and meet the necessities of this corporation. True, it must be done under the powers of eminent domain, but how can adequate damages be reached when the property may be many miles below, the plant entirely subverted, and whole communities be incommoded and injured? The power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce certainly does not go to the extent of granting a charter to a canal company to enable it to enjoy advantages over other corporations or over individuals or municipalities that it can not obtain under the laws of the State, and even if it did, Congress certainly will not grant it in the absence of evidence of governmental necessity. In the cases of the charters to the Pacific railroads the proposed roads were to run through several Territories, which Congress alone could control, as well as over many States and across many navigable streams. In the bridge cases the streams over which the bridges were to be built were navigable streams. In the park cases there was the Government's duty of caring for and marking the graves of its dead soldiers, and hence the governmental necessity of taking such property as might be required for that purpose. (See California v. Pacif. R. R. Co., 127 U. S., 1; Luxton v. Bridge Co., 153 U. S., 525; United States v. Gettysburg R. R. Co., 160 U. S., 668; Kohl v. U. S., 91 U. S., 367.)

The taking of lands already appropriated for one public use will not be authorized even by state legislatures, unless it is convinced of the urgent necessity of the second use and that the advantage accruing to the public will be greater than those arising from the first. Anything else would make the strong hand of the Government the mere instrument by which the last favorite could overthrow the first. Again, the present bill, if passed into law, will be another long stride in the direction of the subversion of the rights of the States to control their own internal affairs, and a further step toward the centralization of power in the Federal Government.

This kind of legislation, Mr. Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations, page 755, declares, belongs to the state governments, and on these governments devolves the duty of making provision for the exercise of the extraordinary right of eminent domain and the protection of private rights against the improper exercise of the same. Of course, where the governmental necessity supervenes we concede the right, but no such necessity exists here, and if this bill is passed we believe it is the mere beginning of much trouble for Congress in the future. If this is declared by the enactment of this legislation to be a governmental necessity, then with equal force every railway, or tramway, or electric-car line, or private hack line that crosses a State line may come to Congress for like favors.

Let us call a halt right here on this character of legislation, which we believe has already been carried too far.

JOHN L. BURNETT.
T. B. DAVIS.

In addition to the views therein expressed, we make the following observations:

H. R. 24853 is intended simply to extend the operation of the act sought to be amended for "three years" by striking out of said act the words "three years" and inserting the words "six years" in one clause thereof, and by striking out the words "ten years" and inserting the words "thirteen years" in another clause.

We do not believe said act ought to be extended, but if the same is extended, it ought to be amended in several particulars.

First. It should be provided that said canal shall never be directly or indirectly leased or sold to any railway transportation company or be permitted directly or indirectly to form any pooling agreement or combination with any railway transportation company.

Second. There ought to be a proviso authorizing the United States to acquire said canal and works after thirty years, upon terms to be fixed by arbitrators, allowing no value to be considered for the franchise conferred by the act or for the earning or the good will. A similar provision was incorporated in the bill as it originally passed the House, but was eliminated in the later stages of its enacting.

Third. It should be provided in specific terms that said canal, as to tolls, fares, and rates to be charged, shall be subject to the right of the several States through which it passes to regulate the same as to all intrastate shipments.

Fourth. Section 20 of said bill should be amended by adding thereto the following: "And such action shall not be removed therefrom to any federal court on the ground that the same involves any federal question or any right accruing under a federal law." We believe that the original act having been passed with a provision therein authorizing Congress to amend, modify, or repeal the same; and the beneficiaries under said act having expended whatever sums they may have expended heretofore under its terms, but not having complied with the terms of section 19 thereof, the Congress now has the legal, equitable, and moral right, before granting the extension desired, to make such alterations in the terms of the grant as may be deemed just and proper, and as would or should have been included in an original grant. We believe that the principle underlying the bill is radically wrong in that it grants in its present terms a monopoly without modification, and without the right to demand therefrom for the State rents, revenues, or license fees, devoting, as it does, great natural resources practically to the exclusive use of the holders of the franchise without requiring or stipulating any return whatever to the State. We believe that the principle of said bill is further wrong in that the Federal Government therein attempts to bestow the right of eminent domain as against the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio to a corporate body of federal creation. We would offer to said bill the amendments attached hereto.

RUFUS HARDY.

Amend by adding:

"And that section 13 of said act be amended by adding thereto as follows:

"'Provided, That said canal shall never be directly or indirectly leased or sold to any railway transportation company or be permitted directly or indirectly to form any pooling agreement or combination with any railway company.'

"And that section 24 of said act be amended as follows:

"'And that the United States shall have the right to acquire said canal and works after thirty years upon terms to be fixed by arbitrators, allowing no value to be considered for the franchise conferred by this act or for earnings or good will.'

"And that section 9 of this act be amended by adding thereto the following:

"'And as to all intrastate tolls, fares, and rates, the said canal shall be subject to regulation and control by the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania, respectively, just as in the case of railways and railway shipments within said States, and that said States shall have all such other powers of regulation and control as they would have over corporations chartered by and under their own State laws.'

"And that section 20 of said act be amended by adding thereto as follows:

"'And such action shall not be removed therefrom to any federal court on the ground that the same involves any federal question or any right accruing under a federal law.'"

I recognize that the bill having passed and a motion to reconsider having been made, and that motion having been laid on the table, there is no possible way of demanding that this House pass again upon it. It is beyond my power of recall. I desire in justice to myself to make and read the statement which I have just made, and read simply so that the RECORD will show that the grant contained in the bill passed this morning did not meet the approval of at least one member of the committee to which it was referred.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, so that there may be no misunderstanding about the request, let me restate it. That all of to-morrow, except the time consumed by the Committee on Pensions and Invalid Pensions, be devoted to general debate on the Indian appropriation bill, the time to be under the control of the chairman or ranking member of the committee on the Republican side and the ranking member on the Democratic side, and the time to be equally divided.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, will this disturb the order of business under Rule XXIV?

The SPEAKER. It disturbs all order of business, except where an exception is made.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not want to discommode——

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose there may be some morning business; then the Pension Committee will come in with its business.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is the order of business I wish kept, to get opportunity to take a bill from the Speaker's table. I have no desire to discommode gentlemen if business on the Speaker's table is to be reached.

Mr. MANN. We probably will not have a quorum to-morrow, and Members, if they go away, ought to have the assurance that important business will not be disposed of.

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I will have to object, unless I can get unanimous consent to pass the bill now.

Mr. MANN. You can not get it to-day.

NATURALIZATION.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report on the bill H. R. 21052 was laid on the table.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that the gentleman can not reconsider that vote.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the motion is in order, but it can not be considered now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. There is a matter of privilege pending, namely, to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My motion is in order if the gentleman's is.

The SPEAKER. No. Entering a motion to reconsider is one thing, and its consideration is another thing.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York has not the right to enter his motion, because he has not stated that he voted in favor of the motion to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there was no record vote.

Mr. MADDEN. He can not reconsider a motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. There was no record vote. Any Member can enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order on the motion.

Mr. MADDEN. I have already made it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thought there was pending a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. A motion to reconsider, under the rule, can be entered at any time; for obvious reasons, of course, it can not take a gentleman off the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The point of order was reserved.

Mr. MANN. No; it was made.

The SPEAKER. A motion to lay on the table may be reconsidered. Under the rules and practice a motion to reconsider may be entered at any time; but consideration of the motion goes over, subject to be called up at another time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it is a privileged motion. It is privileged to call it up at any time, and I enter a motion to lay it on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair may be indulged for a moment, the entry of a motion to reconsider, under the rules or under the practice, is in order at any time; but the consideration of that motion is not in order until business is in order to which the motion referred. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] has the floor on a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on an appropriation bill, which is a motion of higher precedence, and he asks consideration of that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Pending which I made a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Precisely.

Mr. MADDEN. If the motion to reconsider the vote to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] refers is entered, then it makes that a privileged question, to be taken up at any time, whether to-day or a month from to-day, if the House should be in session, does it not?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House a motion to reconsider must be entered within two days, that is, to-day or to-morrow. Now, the entry of the motion is one thing. The consideration of the motion is another thing. If it were not in order to enter the motion at any time, privileged business might be pending both to-day and to-morrow, and the Member would be cut off from the exercise of his right, or the House might prevent him from entering a reconsideration of the motion if it desired to do so. So that, the motion being entered, it can be called up to-day, a week from now, or any other time that it is the pleasure of the House to call it up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have been endeavoring to call it up and move to lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman can not call it up while the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] is pending.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that it takes precedence of all motions except conference reports and motions to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That is, the entry of the motion. Consideration of the motion is only in order when the class of business to which it refers is in order. Now, that class of business is not in order, because there is a motion pending that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to consider a privileged bill, namely, a general appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it in order for a gentleman voting in the minority upon a motion to lay upon the table to enter a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. There was no record vote; and where there is no record vote any Member, however he may have voted in point of fact, may enter that motion, because there is no evidence as to how he did vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. STEENERSON. I object, unless it will not disturb the order of business under Rule XXIV.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that my motion be put.

Mr. PAYNE. I rise to make a privileged motion. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his objection, and the Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN].

The motion of Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 26916, the Indian appropriation bill, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 26916) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the committee to-night to explain any of the provisions of the bill. On to-morrow we will enter into the subject of general debate, and the little I have to say in reference to the bill I will say toward the close of general debate when the members of the committee are prepared to give thought for a moment or two to the real questions covered by this bill. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 26916, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

There was no objection.

WINNEBAGO INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following request from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Committee on Indian Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration, and the bill will be returned to the Senate. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 12, 1909.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

God of the ages, our fathers' God and our God, whose providence has shaped and guided the destiny of men and of nations from time immemorial, we, the people of these United States, recognize our debt of gratitude, and our hearts go out to Thee in thanksgiving and praise for our Nation, "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." We bless Thee for the pure, the true, the noble, the brave whom Thou hast from time to time raised up and who have woven their characters into its fibers and made it strong and great; for this anniversary, which chronicles the birth of one of its greatest benefactors, one of nature's noblemen, a statesman, a patriot, a seer, a prophet, a philanthropist, a knight clad in the armor of righteousness, whose heart went out in love and sympathy to all men—our beloved Abraham Lincoln—who under Thee in the hour of the Nation's greatest trial came forth as its savior; "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," yet who was ever buoyant with faith and hope in the eternal verities, who in the hour of triumph laid down his life for the cause he loved, and though dead, yet lives in the hearts of all lovers of liberty. Help us, we beseech Thee, to emulate his virtues and follow his illustrious example; and Thine be the praise forever, in Christ Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The SPEAKER. Yesterday, by unanimous consent, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] was designated to read the Lincoln Gettysburg address. In pursuance of that order, the gentleman from Illinois will be kind enough to read from the Clerk's desk, and I am sure the House will be much gratified.

Mr. BOUTELL read as follows:

"Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us; that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, as a further and fitting tribute to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DOUGLAS) there were—ayes 58, noes 65.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. NYE] may address the House for thirty minutes on the subject of Abraham Lincoln.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for thirty minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. NYE. Mr. Speaker, I did not anticipate this high honor. Through the kindness of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. SHERMAN of New York], I had expected to address the committee briefly on this fitting subject, on this one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln.

How far the character and public service of Abraham Lincoln have become a part of our national life no one will undertake to say. We know but little of the source of real power. We associate it with external pomp and parade. We think of gathering armies, of magnificent navies, of gleaming swords and clashing steel, of roaring artillery, of waving banners and beating drums; but these are not the sources of real power. Human judgment is often swept from its throne by the spectacular and by transitory appeals to the mere passions of men. But these are but bubbles and foam on the ever-flowing sea of time in which great actions and great events follow in succession. We are prone to look out upon the world and to think that the outer phenomenon of things is the real. We confuse substance with show. Not long ago I read an admirable lecture on the subject of substance and show. We think all substance is bulk, is that which is subject to measurement; but after all, as the great teacher Paul says:

> The things which are seen are temporal; the things which are not seen are eternal.

And this man whose lecture I read spoke of the outer phenomenon of things, the scholastic as distinguished from that reverence of thought which leads men intuitively to that which inspires, rather than mere scholasticism.

The tree, the oak that has stood for a hundred years and dared the tempest and the storm, we think of as it appears outwardly, mere bulk or form, but substance really is that which creates and produces and classifies. The real substance of the tree is unseen. It is that which winds its rings about it year by year, glues the bark to the stem, sends its living leaves to the heavens and its roots far into the earth. It is unseen. The scholars tell us that in the whole vegetable world there are but three or four elements or gases—I think the oxygen, nitrogen, hydrogen, and carbon. The catalogue is not so important; but there is a reverence of thought which might lead us to wonder and adore the infinite intelligence and love which takes this common stuff and works it up into all the manifold manifestations of beauty and life, which makes it an orange here, an olive there, a pine here and an oak there, a dahlia here and a violet there. This is the real substance, the intelligence and power that is, after all, the real. This is the substance; all else is but a part of the show of things, only the outer phenomenon. In human society the same great law is true, whether it be the church, the fraternal organization, or whatever it be; it is not its number, not its form or ceremony or ritual, but its spirit and its life, expressing itself in the daily lives of men. This is substance. And what is a nation? Not the outer phenomenon, not wealth or commerce or mines or fields. There is back of it all a spirit which is the real nation and which constitutes the enduring republic. "Things that are seen are temporal; the things which are not seen are eternal." I present to you to-day what I believe to be a type of that better, interior, and unseen life and spirit of this Republic, and I find it personified in the life and character of that great man whose love for his fellow-men made him the wonder of his day and the wonder of all coming centuries. [Applause.] A celebrated divine in America some time ago, in a discourse upon the subject of truth, maintained that truth was so vital, so immortal in its characteristics, that it expressed itself in man physically in good health, morally in honesty, and intellectually in sagacity. I have thought of this idea much in connection with the life and character of Abraham Lincoln. Sound to the core, honest by birth and principle, realizing that a dishonest dollar would curse the man who got it, knowing that the great law of compensation would assert itself throughout all the ages, and that sooner or later we must pay the penalty for the transgression of it, this man was before all men, in my judgment, in America devoted to the cause of truth, and he would sacrifice all, even life itself, that he might be faithful to it. Truth expressed itself even in this man physically. The great men of the ages have been outdoor men, men who loved the winds that blow over the prairies and make music in the forests; the streams, the valleys, and the hills, furrows and fields, woods, mountains, and plains.

This man, somehow, was the companion of all that a great and infinite God has created. He felt a brotherhood for all things, and even the blood that flows in the violet was kindred to him. He loved the truth, and it found expression in the man physically. As to its expressing itself morally in honesty, I need not comment upon this great character, for he was preeminently and soundly honest, scrupulously exact in all business matters, leaving the country store at night to correct a little matter of change with a customer; in all things obedient to that great command of rendering an equivalent for that which we receive.

Soundly honest, this man is an illustration of the principle of which I speak—in intellect sagacious, clear, his vision almost unerring and prophetic, profound in his thought, clear and chaste in language and expression, his words as direct as the rays of light and, as some one has said, candid as mirrors reflecting the perfect image of his thought. His letter to the Widow Bixby, who had lost five sons on the field of battle, is one of the dearest things in all literature. No scholar can parallel it, no student can eclipse it. Clear in thought, clear in his ideals of government, this man is an illustration of the fact that devotion to truth in life leads to intellectual sagacity. The cardinal principle of his political faith was expressed by the statement that "right makes might."

But the virtues are correlated. One follows another. They never appear singly. We are deceived when we think we see a single virtue and that men excel in one and have no others. Following this love of truth and honesty was courage, noble and sublime. Against the counsel of his party in a time when the Republic was torn by a great moral question, he had clearly seen that this Nation could not endure half slave and half free; and almost taking his life in his hand, he dared to assert it and to maintain it. His dearest friends counseled against it and said it would be ruinous to him and to his party. He said:

> As to me, it makes little difference. This is as I see it. It is a voice within me which I must utter, let the consequences to me be what they may.

But there is a greater quality back of all these. The gifted and eloquent Colonel Watterson said, in his most admirable lecture on Lincoln, "Lincoln was the only man in public life who could have come to leadership in 1861 unembittered by the great slavery controversy." Neither North nor South was there among the ranks of men one who was not more or less inflamed by the spirit of his day. This leads me to speak of the finer and infinite quality which he reflected in his sublime life and toilsome career—love. This man was large enough to love all the universe, the men of all races and all countries. Born in the South, his heart was with his people; his conscience with the cause of human freedom and progress. He might, figuratively and almost literally, be said to have held for four perilous and painful years in one hand the North and in the other the South, thereby to bind and cement these angered sections of our land into a brotherhood as eternal as the word of God Himself. [Applause.] In this quality we have touched the heart of the Infinite.

Coming up from the wilderness of obscurity and poverty and pain, feeling the agonies of struggle, acquainted with labor and toil and hardship, he felt for and loved all men.

Love as the basis of a state has never yet been tried. Statesmen have not advocated it; no one has dared to trust it; but the time will come when we will see, or our children or children's children will see, that this is the one potent and omnipotent force of all the universe, and that a nation or a state founded upon that which Lincoln lived must forever endure. This and this alone will enable men to solve the problems, to rise above the fever and contention of life, as the eagle rises above the breaking storm and soars in an atmosphere untouched by tempest. This is the wonderful quality of Abraham Lincoln. With little opportunities of school or education, self-taught, self-disciplined, this man intuitively loved all men. And when we had emerged from the thick darkness of our national distresses, as we had hoped, into the light of a national—not sectional—victory, this man, repeating what he had often said, "Malice toward none and charity for all," flung over his wounded country the mantle of love and mercy. [Applause.]

It is a sublime lesson. It has written itself in the interior life and soul of this Republic, and it will live when quarrels over tariff and navies are dead. It will live to assert the eternal truth of the principles which he lived and which he taught.

Mr. Speaker, other luminous and living stars shine in our national firmament; but high in the dome, clear and ever clearer to the patriot's vision, is this refulgent and transcendent orb, lighting the pathway of advancing civilization, growing brighter and brighter, unto that perfect day when universal peace shall reign, "When nation shall not rise up against nation, and men shall learn war no more." [Loud and long-continued applause.]

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, one year ago to-day my colleague [Mr. SHEPPARD] delivered before the New York Republican Club an address upon Abraham Lincoln. It was the first speech on Lincoln by a Southerner and a Democrat before that distinguished organization. I ask unanimous consent that this speech may be printed in the RECORD as an estimate of the life and character of Mr. Lincoln from the view point of a southern man. [Loud applause.]

The speech is as follows:

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

SPEECH OF CONGRESSMAN MORRIS SHEPPARD, REPUBLICAN CLUB BANQUET, NEW YORK CITY, FEBRUARY 12, 1908.

In introducing Congressman SHEPPARD, President Young said the committee in charge of the dinner, although representing a Republican organization, took the position that the fame of Lincoln had passed beyond sectional lines. Therefore it had invited from that section of the country where Lincoln's acts were first the cause of violent controversy a representative differing in political faith, but not in loyalty to the Government. At these words, as the Congressman arose to speak, there was a hearty demonstration from the diners, who joined with a will in the singing of the old rallying song of "Dixie." (New York Tribune, February 13, 1908.)

On the wall of a southern home there is to-day a letter in a frame, a letter which reads:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 10, 1865.

Hon. A. H. STEPHENS:

According to our agreement, your nephew, Lieutenant Stephens, goes to you bearing this note. Please in return to select and send me that officer of the same rank, imprisoned at Richmond, whose physical condition most urgently requires his release.

Respectfully, A. LINCOLN.

In a corner of the frame is a photograph of Lincoln on which appears his signature in his own handwriting. At the close of the Hampton Roads conference early in 1865 Lincoln had asked Alexander Stephens, vice-president of the confederacy and one of the southern commissioners, if he could do anything for him personally. "Nothing," said Stephens, "unless you can send me my nephew, who has been a prisoner on Johnsons Island for twenty months." "I shall be glad to do it; let me have his name," was the prompt reply. A few days later Lieutenant Stephens left for Richmond, where the exchange was effected, carrying the letter and the picture before described, both the gifts of Lincoln, and for more than forty years they have remained the chief treasures of a Dixie fireside. This incident was but one of a host of others showing in Lincoln a spirit that poised on wings of light above the wrath and gloom of war.

But for other and wider reasons it is proper that the portrait of Lincoln should adorn this southern home. He was born of southern parentage on Kentucky soil. His father was a Virginian; his grandfather was a Virginian; his mother was a Virginian. His mother! The very word hallows the lips that utter it. The world has not yet grasped its debt to the mothers of mankind. The mother is the luster and the hope of history. From her bosom flow the impulses that fashion governments and alter civilizations. With whisper and caress she organizes parliaments, revolutions, epochs. She is the central figure of all human sacrifice. Life is the flower of her agony, the fruitage of her pain. Humanity is cradled in her tears. That men may be she fronts the grave, yea, at each birth endures a living crucifixion. Lincoln's mother possessed in marvelous measure the qualities that make maternity sacred. He never forgot her prayers, prayers that made the cabin in the wilderness a temple grander than St. Peters or Cologne. The privations of the frontier soon crushed her tender life, and a few days before she died, her lovely face already radiant with the ecstacy of heaven, she obtained from him a promise that he would never touch inebriating drink, a promise that remained as sacred as her memory. His father, always in deepest poverty, had removed from Kentucky largely because the spread of slavery and the aristocracy surrounding it tended to degrade the status of the whites who were compelled to labor with their hands. Thus, in his earliest years were permanently impressed on Lincoln's soul the ideas of liberty, equality, and personal rectitude that led him later to acclaim that day the happiest of history when there should be neither slave nor drunkard in the world. Such was his mother's influence that he afterwards ascribed to her all that he was or hoped to be. The clumsy, hand-hewn coffin in which she was interred, the lack of ceremony, due to the fact that few ministers visited that remote vicinity, the lonely grave in the clearing, deepened the sadness that solitude and hardship had implanted in his nature. He did not rest until several months later he knelt in the snow while a wandering preacher, summoned at his earnest instance, delivered a funeral sermon over her grave. It should be said here that the devoted woman, a native of Kentucky, who succeeded Lincoln's mother in the Lincoln home, recognized at once his unusual capacities, and employed every means to encourage and develop them. To her he gave a love and reverence that were reflected in his spotless conduct. The teachings of these two women gave gentleness and grace to all his acts and must have prompted deed after deed of mercy in the memorable conflict with which his name is forever associated.

When Lincoln, in 1832, announced his candidacy for the Illinois legislature, he stated that the supreme purpose of his life was to win the esteem of his fellowmen by being worthy of it. Thus, at the age of 23, he proclaimed the basic impulse of his career—the ambition to be useful to mankind. This impulse was but prophetic of the principle of brotherhood that was to mark the consummation of his efforts and to signalize his relation to history. Perhaps no other man of commanding fame ever struggled so effectively against so unpromising an environment. The family had removed from Kentucky to Indiana, from Indiana to Illinois, following the frontier's westward sweep, locating in secluded forests, felling trees with which to construct the crudest shelter, and clearing land for cultivation. In the labors of the farm and woods young Lincoln shared to the fullest degree. The ordinary facilities of the most rudimentary education were beyond his reach. His entire schooling did not comprise twelve months. Yet he managed to obtain and study with absorbing eagerness Bunyan, Æsop, Weems's Washington, and the Bible. Perhaps Æsop inspired his celebrated habit of reinforcing argument with parable and anecdote. With what prophetic interest must he have followed the trials of Washington and the patriot armies in founding the Nation he was to be summoned to preserve! He seems to have been especially impressed with Washington's unvarying trust in God, a sentiment he approved and emulated. To show his estimate of Washington, let me cite an excerpt from his address on Washington's Birthday at Springfield in 1842: "Washington is the mightiest name on earth—long since mightiest in moral reformation. On that name a eulogy is expected. It can not be. To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe pronounce the name, and in its naked, deathless splendor leave it shining on." In the Bible, of which he was a constant student, he found the doctrine that supplied the definition of his existence, the doctrine embodied in Christ's reply to the lawyer in the temple, the doctrine of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, the doctrine that Lincoln considered of itself sufficient to form the basis of a church, the doctrine his life proclaimed and his death ennobled, the doctrine of which the American Declaration of Independence is but another form, the doctrine on which rests all liberty and progress. Such were the materials with which this youthful Vulcan hammered his being into heroic mold and purpose. In that stern pioneer age labor of severest form was honor's essence, equality was the natural state, and men were loved for what they could contribute to the general good. In such a school Lincoln learned to revere humanity, truth, and God. In such a school he developed a gentle soul, a giant stature, and an iron will. His was a universal sympathy with all human aspiration. Hate found no lodgment in his heart; there kindness and mercy, like twin Portias, pleaded always against the pound of flesh.

These elements were slowly fusing in the fires of experience and ambition, of conflicts, defeats, successes, for almost thirty years from the date of his first announcement for office. His initial race resulted in disaster, and without means, without profession, he wavered between the careers of lawyer and of blacksmith. In 1834 he was elected to the legislature and began preparation for the law, borrowing the necessary books and studying alone. Reelected to the legislature in 1836, in 1838, and 1840, he took an important part in framing the legislation of that formative period, obtained a splendid training in practical statesmanship and parliamentary law, and gave such evidence of leadership that he was twice his party nominee for speaker. He continued the practice of law with signal industry for more than two decades, maintaining the highest standards and applying the doctrine of brotherhood to his profession. He believed that the lawyer should discourage litigation, that the lawyer's true mission was the mission of peacemaker. During the early years at the bar persistent poverty and the death of the woman of his first love subjected him to severest melancholy. Chosen an elector on the Harrison ticket in 1840, on the Clay ticket in 1844, and canvassing his own and adjoining States in both campaigns, happily married in 1842, and elected to Congress in 1846, he rapidly became a factor of more than State importance. His single term in Congress was marked by faithful service and several comprehensive speeches. He helped to make Taylor the Whig candidate for President in 1848, thereby contributing to that shrewdest of movements by which his party secured the political fruitage of the war it had so bitterly opposed. Another significant act was his bill to prohibit slavery in the District of Columbia, providing cash payments to owners voluntarily manumitting their slaves. Already he was considering the idea of compensated emancipation which during the war he urged on Congress and the border States, and which he never entirely surrendered. It was during this term in Congress that he wrote a letter to his young law partner containing certain rules of conduct which every young man ought to engrave upon his heart, a statement comprising a sounder and more helpful philosophy than any similar number of words in all literature, a statement breathing brotherhood in every line: "The way for a young man to rise is to improve himself every way he can, never suspecting that anybody wishes to hinder him. Allow me to assure you that suspicion and jealousy never did help any man in any situation. There may sometimes be ungenerous attempts to keep a young man down; and they will succeed, too, if he allows his mind to be diverted from its true channel to brood over the attempted injury." In a speech a few years before he had expressed another phase of his love of humanity in this sentence: "If you would win a man to your cause first convince him that you are his sincere friend." There is a verse from Aleyn which elaborates this beautiful idea, an idea so illuminative of Lincoln's soul:

"The fine and noble way to kill a foe
Is not to kill him; you with kindness may
So change him that he shall cease to be so;
And then he's slain. Sigismund used to say
His pardons put his foes to death; for when He mortify'd their hate, he killed them then."

Retiring from Congress, Lincoln devoted himself to the law until the repeal of the Missouri Compromise in 1854 stirred the land almost to frenzy. Douglas, the brilliant Democrat from Illinois, had been chiefly instrumental in the repeal of the compromise, which had been acclaimed as the solution of the slavery question. Lincoln and Douglas became the champions of conflicting theories, and in a series of remarkable debates employed every weapon of logic and exhausted every field of illustration. In his speech before the convention which nominated him for the United States Senate in opposition to Douglas, in the debates with that master of the forum, in inaugural addresses and presidential messages, on the field of Gettysburg and elsewhere, Lincoln gave deliverances that in chaste and lofty eloquence, in simplicity and power, stand unsurpassed. He was an emphatic advocate of prohibition, canvassing the State of Illinois in its behalf and declaring that the liquor traffic was the tragedy of civilization. On the morning of his assassination he said to Major Merwin, with whom he had stumped Illinois for prohibition, that after reconstruction the next great question would be the overthrow of the liquor traffic. The rapid march of prohibitory sentiment throughout the United States to-day shows with what prescience he spoke. The ideal of human brotherhood was with him ever uppermost. Toward the South he exhibited the most tolerant and affectionate spirit. In his famous speech at Peoria in 1854 he said: "Before proceeding, let me say I think I have no prejudice against the southern people. They are just what we would be in their situation. If slavery did not now exist among them, they would not introduce it. If it did now exist among us, we should not instantly give it up. * * * When southern people tell us they are no more responsible for the origin of slavery than we, I acknowledge the fact." The keynote of his position was resistance to the extension of slavery. In his speech at Cooper Institute, in New York, in February, 1860, he said: "Wrong as we think slavery is, we can yet afford to let it alone where it is, because that much is due to the necessity arising from its actual presence in the Nation; but can we while our votes will prevent it allow it to spread into the national territory and to overrun us here in the free States?" He considered the Emancipation Proclamation necessary to the preservation of the Republic. The maintenance of the Union as the chief hope of brotherhood and freedom was his predominating purpose. He cherished to the last the idea of compensated emancipation. As late as February, 1865, when the South was prostrate, he presented to his Cabinet a plan of payment for manumitted slaves. His secretary, Nicolay, who probably understood him better than any other biographer, said that he never relinquished the idea, and intimated a renewal of his efforts in this direction in his last public address.

His election to the Presidency and the opening of the American civil war made him the chief civic figure of the most colossal crisis in his country's life. Every element of his character was brought into instant and effective play. It is difficult to appreciate the magnitude of the task he met and mastered. His was the responsible supervision of all civil and military administration. The young party he had led to victory was naturally filled with numerous and discordant groups all clamorous for recognition. Every phase of feeling as to the policies of the Government in its most trying emergency poured a stream of argument and protest across his audience chamber. To harmonize the conflicting sentiments and interests required superbest skill. Relations with other nations demanded the coolest and most thorough judgment. He rewrote Seward's dispatch on the subject of England's recognition of southern belligerency, converting that violent document, which most probably would have incited foreign war, into a model of diplomatic propriety. The selection of commanders for the untried millions who assembled at his call involved the rarest penetration. Forbearance, sympathy, and keenest insight marked his treatment of the generals in the field. He studied the art of war and demonstrated a military talent of the highest type. His orders and inquiries showed a technical familiarity with all the problems of the contest. He grasped the essential features of the proper handling of the Union arms and resource. From the beginning he foreshadowed the course of the strife with such accuracy that competent authorities have pronounced him one of the ablest strategists of that world-astounding war. Throughout the changing fortunes of the conflict he was the same serene, unyielding, all-compelling force that welded every controversy and every defeat into final triumph. Modest almost to self-effacement, he held himself the humblest of all the Presidents. Of his second election to the Presidency he said there was in his gratitude to the people no taint of personal triumph and that he felt no pleasure in succeeding over others. He exercised the prerogative of pardon with tenderness and enthusiasm. Mighty as was his brain, still mightier was his heart. He had begun a humane and peaceful reconstruction of several States and had he lived the Nation's wounds, which he felt were also his, would have far more quickly healed. The knowledge that despite his love for all mankind his efforts for human elevation would be distorted and assailed, that however glorious the ultimate victory thousands of American homes were being desolated, that brother was emptying the blood of brother, and the premonition that he would not outlive the struggle wrapped him in isolation and sorrow and gave his features an infinite sadness in repose.

His death was one of the profoundest calamities that ever shocked the earth. To his noble wife he remarked as the clandestine assassin was about to fire, "There is no city I desire so much to see as Jerusalem." He was not permitted to see the old Jerusalem, but in a few hours he was to stand among the glories of the new. Now what is the relation of his life to the Republic he aided so materially to preserve? It is the development of the idea of brotherhood on which the continued preservation of this Union depends. What lesson emanates from his spectral figure as it rises from that April night in 1865? It is the love of Abraham Lincoln for every man, woman, and child beneath the American flag. Invoking his memory, I, a Southerner and a Democrat, true to every principle that animates my patriotic, valorous, and incorruptible people, come among you, Northerners and Republicans, equally loyal to your convictions, as fellow-countryman, friend, and brother. New York is my country as well as Texas. Massachusetts, California, Illinois are as dear to me as Louisiana, Georgia, or Tennessee. The memory of Lincoln is one of the fundamental buttresses of the reunited America of the twentieth century. In fulfillment of his desires and dreams the American people are to-day a mighty and a deathless brotherhood. Forgotten are the discords of the past; departed are the specters of civil strife. Near Columbus, Ohio, was situated Camp Chase, one of the military prisons of the North during the civil war. There thousands of southern soldiers died, far from the land of their birth and love. But their graves have received the tenderest care from northern hearts and hands and an arch has been erected on that solemn spot bearing the word "Americans." This word expresses the spirit of patriotism that to-day uplifts and thrills the Nation, the spirit in which Lincoln moved and spoke and prayed. It hallows the past, it inspires the present, and oh, may it animate the endless reaches of the future. It arouses love for every part of our common country, for every city and every State, every mountain and every shore, every forest and every plain—love for our traditions and our history—love for the home of freedom, the hope of liberty, the light of time, the radiance of the ages—our own United States.

"The poet sings of sunny France,
Fair olive-laden Spain,
The Grecian Isles, Italia's smiles,
And India's torrid plain;
Of Egypt, countless ages old,
Dark Afric's palms and dates;
Let me acclaim the land I name—
My own United States.

The poet sings of Switzerland,
Braw Scotland's heathered moor,
The shimm'ring sheen of Ireland's green,
Old England's rock-bound shore,
Quaint Holland and the Fatherland
Their charms in verse relates;
Let me acclaim the land I name—
My own United States.

I love every inch of her prairie land,
Each stone on her mountains' side,
I love every drop of the water clear
That flows in her rivers wide;
I love every tree, every blade of grass,
Within Columbia's gates,
The Queen of the earth is the land of my birth—
My own United States."

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that there may be read at the Clerk's desk a communication from the honorable Secretary of State, transmitting an expression which has been received from the British Government expressing sympathy in the celebration of the centenary of Abraham Lincoln.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that a communication transmitted by the Secretary of State may be read from the desk.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

I am, with great truth and respect, sir,
Your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

(For the Secretary of State).

His Excellency the Right Hon. JAMES BRYCE, O. M.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five days longer in which to extend the remarks which I delivered in the House on the 6th instant.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

FORT M'PHERSON MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill H. R. 27864.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27864) granting a strip of land along the eastern boundary of the Fort McPherson Military Reservation to the commissioners of Fulton County, Ga., for road purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a deed of conveyance to the commissioners of Fulton County, Ga., of the title to and ownership of a strip of land 20 feet in width along the eastern boundary of the Fort McPherson Military Reservation, the said land to be used in widening the road between College Park, East Point, Fort McPherson, and Atlanta, Ga.: Provided, That the cost of removal and reconstruction of any post buildings which it may be found necessary to move in connection with the construction of said roadway shall be borne by the authorities of Fulton County, Ga.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out the words "of the title to the ownership of," in lines 5 and 6, and insert in lieu thereof the words "a right of way over."

Strike out the words "the said land to be used in widening the," in lines 7 and 8, and insert in lieu thereof the words "for so long as the same shall be used for a public."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In line 4 there is a mistake in the language of the bill that I want to correct. Instead of "conveyance" the word should be "conveying," so as to read, "to issue a deed conveying," and so forth, and also an amendment of the title.

Page 1, line 4, strike out "conveyance" and insert "conveying."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. LIVINGSTON was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: A bill granting a right of way over a strip of land along the eastern boundary of Fort McPherson Military Reservation to the commissioners of Fulton County, Ga., for road purposes.

FORT KEOGH MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 24149, and that it be considered now.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 24149) granting to the Montana, Wyoming and Southern Railway Company a right of way across the Fort Keogh Military Reservation, Mont.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Montana, Wyoming and Southern Railway Company, a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the State of Wyoming, and empowered and authorized by the laws of the State of Montana to construct, operate, and maintain a railroad and engage in business therein, be, and is hereby, granted a right of way across the Fort Keogh Military Reservation, upon such line, in the vicinity of the valley of the Tongue River, as may be approved by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the right of way hereby granted shall not exceed 100 feet in width, except where side tracks, spurs, turn-outs, turntables, and a station are located or are to be located, and at such point or points the right of way shall not exceed 200 feet on each side of the main track and not exceed 2,000 feet in length.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Add as a new section:

"SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 9160. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish four condemned brass or bronze field guns, carriages, and cannon balls to the State of South Carolina;

S. 8822. An act providing for the relinquishment by the United States of certain lands to the county of Kootenai, in the State of Idaho; and

S. 6392. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to donate two condemned cannon to the county court of Mercer County, W. Va.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 24140. An act extending the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, concerning transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 9160. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish four condemned brass or bronze field guns, carriages, and cannon balls to the State of South Carolina—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 8822. An act providing for the relinquishment by the United States of certain lands to the county of Kootenai, in the State of Idaho—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 6392. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to donate two condemned cannon to the county court of Mercer County, W. Va.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORGANIZATION OF MILITIA IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 21926, an act for the organization of the militia in the District of Columbia, with Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask whether there are any amendments that require consideration in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; there are not.

Mr. MANN. Are there any new items in the proposition?

Mr. STEENERSON. No. There is a provision in regard to the band, and the department suggested that we change the title. There were to be two regimental bands instead of a brigade band. It appears on the face of it as if it incurred expense, but there is no more expense than there would be under the existing law.

Mr. MANN. Is it a new item?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; we simply change the designation of the band.

Mr. MANN. That would not require consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEENERSON. No. I would like to say that most of these amendments were made necessary by the action of the House in striking out of the original bill as reported, the eight sections relative to organization. That left it so that there was only one section providing that the organization should be prescribed by the President. We left in the original act of 1889 the eight sections which ought to be stricken out. That is the reason why all of the amendments in regard to renumbering the sections were made necessary.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] made objection to certain provisions in the bill when it was before the House, and amendments were made in accordance with his recommendation. Are those amendments retained in the bill?

Mr. STEENERSON. They are retained in the bill, and because they are retained the other changes were made necessary. The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate gave very careful consideration to it, and these amendments were suggested by the Secretary of War, and I have his letter here in the report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the gentleman from Minnesota that there are no new items in the bill that require consideration in Committee of the Whole, and that is satisfactory, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. STEENERSON. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk calls the attention of the Chair to the fact that on page 9 of the bill, Senate amendment 79 says to "insert an amendment at page 8, line 2," and that it should be page 18 instead of page 8. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota, if he so desires, that his motion should cover all his amendments except 79, and move to concur in that amendment with an amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in all the Senate amendments except amendment 79, and to concur in amendment 79 with an amendment striking out the word "eight" in amendment 79 and inserting the word "eighteen," so that it will read "18."

The motion of Mr. STEENERSON was agreed to.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 25391) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and cer-

R. 26746) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, with Senate amendments.

SUBPORTS BLAINE AND SUMAS, WASH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request from the Senate, which was read.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

RELATIVE TO THE PRINTING OF THE CENSUS.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a letter which I have received from the Public Printer touching upon the ability of the Government Printing Office to print at reasonable prices the census. I think the Members of the House should read this letter, and hence I make this request. I voted against having this printing done at the Government Printing Office, but I think I made a mistake; and thinking so, I requested that information from the Public Printer on the subject, and he sent me this letter. After I had voted I saw something in an article in one of the papers from the Public Printer, or some one, claiming that the information which we had before the House was not as reliable as it should have been, and I telephoned the Public Printer and requested all the information he had, and this is his reply, which I think should be printed in the RECORD for the benefit of Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the printing of a letter from the Public Printer relating to the printing of the census. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, February 8, 1909.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry, I have the honor to transmit herewith the following statement:

It is safe to assume that the report that the census printing would cost 55 per cent more if executed in the Government Printing Office than if awarded to private contractors, was based on a statement contained in a letter signed by W. S. Rossiter, chief clerk of the Census Bureau, and addressed to the Hon. CHESTER I. LONG, on January 21, 1909, printed on page 1586, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, No. 36, of January 28, 1909, alleging that if the Cuban Census Report was printed in the Government Printing Office the cost would be $17,750.52, and that the actual cost for the work now being performed by private contractors was $11,752.57.

The estimated cost of producing the Cuban Census Report at the Government Printing Office is a computation made by Mr. W. S. Rossiter and not by the Government Printing Office or any official connected therewith. On May 26, 1908, an employee in the office of the chief clerk of the Census Bureau inquired of the Government Printing Office by phone as to the probable cost of producing the Cuban census on the basis of 25,000 copies, 620 pages each, including 32 half-tone cuts; and in reply to this inquiry an informal estimate was given by phone of $15,905.60, including everything for the finished product.

The Government Printing Office was never asked for a formal estimate of the cost of producing the Cuban census. On December 14, 1908, Mr. Rossiter asked for an estimate of the cost of producing the Cuban census, on the basis of 20,000 copies, 708 pages each, size trimmed 6 inches by 9 inches, stock for books and illustrations to be supplied by his office, including 26 full page half-tones, of which 12 were printed on both sides, making a total of 14 inserts; books to be bound in full Holliston buckram. In response to this inquiry, Mr. Rossiter was furnished with an estimate of $12,957.20; to this estimate he added $4,117.48 for the actual cost of paper, $276.04 for the cost of illustrations, $400 for alterations actually required in completing book, five hundred hours at 80 cents, making a total of $17,750.52, which he quotes in his letter to Senator LONG, above referred to, as the estimated cost of producing the Cuban census at the Government Printing Office.

The basis on which this estimate was obtained is erroneous, and the resultant estimate unfair and misleading. A desire to procure an estimate fair to the Government Printing Office on the cost of producing a book already in print, as was the Cuban Census Report on December 14, 1908, would have prompted an inquirer actuated by a desire to be fair to have submitted a copy of the book itself.

Mr. Rossiter has done the Government Printing Office further injustice in his invidious comparison, in which he states that the actual cost of producing the Cuban Census Report by private contractors was $11,752.57 and the estimated cost of producing the same work at the Government Printing Office was $17,750.52. In making this comparison Mr. Rossiter knew that the $11,752.57 did not include the cost of paper. He also knew that it did not include the cost of $500 for traveling expenses, nor did it include the item of $100 for freight; and he must have known that the figures quoted as the estimate for the Government Printing Office, viz, $17,750.52, did include the cost of paper, estimated by him as $4,117.48; and cost of illustrations, $276.04 (overestimate); and the item of $400 "for alterations actually required in completing the book;" from which total estimate Mr. Rossiter has since been magnanimous enough to deduct $126 overestimate by him on the cost of illustrations.

After drawing his tabular comparison, Mr. Rossiter states, "from this you will perceive that a total expenditure of $14,540.14 to private contractors has produced work of an entirely satisfactory and, indeed, excellent character, which would have cost $22,654.79 if produced in the Government Printing Office, an excess of 55 per cent." Mr. Rossiter has quoted $4,117.48 as the cost of paper, which, added to $11,752.57, and $600 for traveling expenses and freight, shows a total cost of the production of the Cuban Census as $16,470.05. A copy of the Cuban Census Report has been procured by this office, and the Government Printing Office estimate for producing this work, based on the present scale of prices, including the cost of the same paper as used in the work is $16,367.06, $102.99 less than the total cost of producing the work by private contractors, and this includes 32 inserts as compared with 14 inserts, as the Government Printing Office does not print two plates on one sheet, according to Mr. Rossiter's figures.

I desire to say further, that based on the present scale of charges used by the Government Printing Office, had the Cuban Census Report been produced in the Government Printing Office and printed on the same quality of paper as is used on all census bulletins and publications, it would have cost $13,949.02, representing a saving of $2,501.03 to the Census Bureau over the cost of having the work produced by private contractors; and in this connection attention should be given to the fact that the scale of prices as charged by the Government Printing Office includes the element of wages 50 per cent higher than that paid by the private contractors, and it is not a fair assumption that because the private contractors in this instance were able to produce this comparatively small job at such low figures as is claimed for them, that the entire work of reports of the Thirteenth Census, consisting of 8 volumes of 1,200 pages each could be produced as cheaply. It is unthinkable that this great work can be farmed out and peddled around to country shops or low-wage binderies and results obtained which would be satisfactory to the Government.

I consider it my duty, however, to call your attention to the following statement from the Director of the Census which, appears on the same page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

"In addition to the question of cost there is also the very important question of expedition. The pending bill requires that the Thirteenth Census shall be compiled and published within two years from the date of the enumeration. Here again the matter is entirely beyond the control of the Director, unless some latitude is given. The copy for the current census report upon the annual mortality statistics, almost entirely tabular matter, consisting of over 500 pages, was sent to the Public Printer more than one month ago, and the office is still awaiting the proofs for some of this report. It has been explained, in response to frequent inquiry, that the Printing Office is much crowded with tabular matter, and that the Census Office must take its turn with the rest, and that delays, especially when Congress is in session, are inevitable. If delays are to occur in handling the Thirteenth Census, similar to those now encountered in the mortality report, and in other reports, it will be impossible to comply with the provisions above quoted, requiring publication within two years. Necessarily, the printing of the final volumes must be largely crowded into the last months of the last year of the census period, when Congress will be in session."

In reply to this unwarranted reflection upon the ability of the Government Printing Office to perform the census work, I submit the following statement:

The first installment of copy of 160 folios was received in the Government Printing Office on November 17, 1908. The tracing folios had to be placed on this copy by the copy editors. Composition was started on November 28, 1908 (a Sunday and a holiday intervened). Additional copy was received on December 2, 3, and 5, but the last installment of copy was not delivered to the Government Printing Office until December 18, 1908.

The first proofs were sent to the Census Office on December 9, 1908, and these proofs were not returned to the Government Printing Office until January 22, 1909. Proofs were sent to the Census Bureau by the Government Printing Office on December 15, 22, 23, 28, and 29, and January 8 and 9; and on January 11 composition was completed and the last proofs delivered to the Census Bureau. In thirty-two working days 314 long galleys were put in type and sent to the Census Bureau.

The Census Bureau returned some proofs to the Government Printing Office on January 15, 1909, or one week after the Director of the Census wrote his complaint to Senator LONG. The proofs of the first galleys were not returned to this office until January 22, 1909.

On January 22 the last galleys, 210 in number, were received. Page proofs were sent to the Census Bureau as follows:

	Pages.
January 28	1 to 80
February 1	81 to 149
February 2	150 to 215
February 3	216 to 251
February 4	252 to 342
February 5	343 to 381
February 6	382 to 476
February 8	477 to 526

which includes the last page. None of the said page proofs have been returned up to the present, except 1–80, just received.

The Public Printer has never been requested to submit an estimate of the cost of printing the Thirteenth Census.

In conclusion, I respectfully call your attention to my letter, dated January 25, 1909, addressed to the Hon. E. D. CRUMPACKER, which is found on page 1586, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, No. 36, of January 28, 1909, reading as follows:

"I have the honor to transmit for your consideration the following statement relative to the printing of the Thirteenth Census:

"The plant of the Government Printing Office includes 79 linotype (type-setting) machines, 162 monotype keyboards, and 124 monotype casting machines. The monotype machines are especially adapted to the work of setting tabular matter. The major portion of the composition for the census reports consists of tabular matter. With this large plant of monotype machines, I have no hesitancy in saying that the census work can be handled promptly, satisfactorily, and economically from the standpoint of the Census Bureau as well as of the Government Printing Office.

"The regular work of the Government is not of sufficient volume to require the use of the entire plant of monotype machines, and the Public Printer who purchased the equipment must necessarily have had in mind its utilization in producing the reports of the United States Census Bureau. A proper return to the Government from this investment in machines can not be had unless the volume of tabular matter supplied to this office is greatly increased.

"The equipment of the binding and press-room divisions is adequate to perform expeditiously, satisfactorily, and economically the reports of the Census Bureau in addition to the regular run of Government work.

"A census report page contains 10,000 ems of tabular matter. The output of a monotype caster is about 4,800 ems per hour. We have equipment sufficient to turn out 128 pages per day in addition to the current work of the office. I confidently make the statement that the Government Printing Office can perform the printing of the census reports more expeditiously than any other office, or combination of offices, in the United States.

"If the Census Office will furnish its copy as regularly and edited in the same manner that it will be compelled to edit if sent to contracting printers, the cost of the census work can be materially reduced below the standard price of 80 cents per thousand ems (single price). By proper editing of the copy proof changes can be avoided, the cost of proof reading minimized, and the quantity of killed matter greatly reduced. The cost of producing the census work in this office depends upon the extent to which the Government Printing Office and the Census Bureau cooperate and work in harmony. I assure you that I will, with my assistants, exert every possible effort to bring about the much-desired cooperative relation, and, when this is accomplished, I am positive that the cost of composition will not exceed $12 per page of six-point tabular matter, and may possibly be brought below that amount.

"The Government Printing Office is now experiencing difficulty in securing the services of competent machine operators to perform the extra work of Congress. We can only retain the services of highly skilled mechanics by providing them with continuous employment. Men of this class will not leave permanent positions to accept temporary employment in the Government Printing Office during the sessions of Congress, and unless the maximum volume of work possible be held by the Government to be performed in its own thoroughly equipped plant it will be impossible for the Public Printer to keep intact a working force of skilled mechanics sufficient to properly handle the work of the so-called 'rush season.'

"In view of the ample equipment of the Government Printing Office, I certainly consider the establishment of any additional branch offices to be noneconomical.

"All of which is respectfully submitted."

Respectfully,
SAM'L B. DONNELLY,
Public Printer.

Hon. JOHN WESLEY GAINES, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Also the following committee amendments:

On page 2, in line 22, strike out the word "fifty," and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixty." This rate of $60, which is an increase of the pension of John W. Burst (S. 1588) from $40 per month now granted to him by the Pension Bureau, is deemed justified by reason of the officer's condition, it being shown that he is a complete mental and physical wreck.

Also, on page 5, in line 17, after the word "thirty," insert the word "six." This is the case of Alfred A. Gambill (S. 4894), whose physical condition, as described in the report accompanying the bill, leads your committee to the conclusion that a rating of $36 instead of $30 per month should obtain.

Also, on page 16, in line 11, strike out the word "twenty-four," and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty." This is the case of George W. Buswell (S. 8589). The long and honorable services of the officer, together with his present deplorable condition, lead the committee to recommend a rating of $30 per month.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the several bills were passed was laid upon the table.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 26916) making appropriation for the maintenance of the Indian Department.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 26916, a bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING].

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, early in this session the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] introduced a resolution of inquiry to investigate the transfer of the Panama Canal to the United States Government, and the method of payment therefor. Again, on the 26th and 29th of January, he made two speeches in support of his position, and made charges against certain gentlemen.

At that time I charged him with getting much of his material from a well-known source, the New York World, to which he made the following answer:

> I desire to say, in the most emphatic manner, I never have received from the New York World, or from any other newspaper in all the world, the slightest assistance in the investigations I have made, and they have furnished me with none of these documents I put in the RECORD; nor have they furnished me with the slightest information that enabled me to obtain any of them.

I again assert that the gentleman got much of his material from the New York World, and I propose to show this by the gentleman's own admission, made in the New York World October 23, 1908, wherein Mr. RAINEY, the New York World, and certain leaders of the Democratic party entered into an agreement to carry the matter to Congress.

Either the gentleman has forgotten this agreement, and the statement he made in the World of October 23, or he was very careless of speech.

Let me read a clipping from the New York World of October 23, 1908:

> PANAMA AFFAIRS TO GO BEFORE CONGRESS—DEMOCRATS REACH AGREEMENT TO ASK FOR PROBE OF DEAL UNCOVERED BY THE WORLD.
> (Special to the World.)
> An investigation of the sale of the Panama Canal will be demanded by the Democrats when Congress convenes in December. Under an agreement reached by Democratic leaders to-day, Representative HENRY T. RAINEY, of Illinois, will, on the first day of the session, introduce a resolution calling for the appointment of a special committee to investigate the matter.

Mind you, entered into an agreement with leaders of the Democratic party.

> Mr. RAINEY said that a resolution of this character would be privileged. This, he thinks, will bring the matter before the House in such a way that it can not be pigeonholed, even if the Republicans should make the attempt.
> "I expect to make it my principal business next session," said Mr. RAINEY. "I have no doubt the investigation will go through, even if it hits men in the highest official positions.
> "The New York World has done the public a great service, and now the public should be taken into the confidence of the administration and made fully acquainted with all details of the transaction by which $40,000,000 was paid out of the United States Treasury. This is no private affair——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Are you still quoting from Mr. RAINEY's statement?

Mr. LOVERING. I am still quoting from Mr. RAINEY's statement:

> "And the people of the country have a right to demand the facts.
> "I am sorry the President's letter to Senator KNOX did not clear up the mystery surrounding the Panama Canal deal. He ought to be able to tell whether or not his brother-in-law, Douglas Robinson, and the brother of the Republican candidate were interested in the American syndicate which succeeded in getting control of the securities of the Panama Canal Company just before the Nicaragua route was mysteriously abandoned."

This is from the New York World of that date, which thus quotes Mr. RAINEY as a part of the same report and, it seems to me, connects Mr. RAINEY absolutely and directly with the New York World; and certainly when he commends the New York World for letting light in upon the situation he admits that his information comes from that source.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts? It may be that the New York World did not originate all of the scandalous stories that are published in its columns, but its columns were open to them, and this much we do know—that the World did give circulation to them. The perpetrators of these false statements are known, and the story of their doings reveals a chapter in the history of blackmailing that is rare in the annals of crime. Yes, these gentlemen are known, their names are known, their aliases are known, their haunts are known, and their plans are known.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman object to stating who they are?

Mr. LOVERING. At the proper time. I am laboring under some embarrassment because my friend from Illinois is not present.

Mr. BURLESON. Did you notify him that you were going to make your address?

Mr. LOVERING. Personally, no.

I want to say that these men have been run down and brought to book; and it turns out that some of them have been convicted of criminal offenses and stand a good chance of going to the penitentiary. Whether the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman will not object, if it is a matter of record, to state who these ex-convicts are whom he alleges are doing this?

Mr. LOVERING. I will say to the gentleman that before long they may be produced in court, and for that reason I will not state their names here. Their names have been brought before the grand jury of New York and the grand jury in Washington.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman state how he got his information as to the names?

Mr. LOVERING. At the proper time I will.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman state to the House how he is in possession of the facts that were brought out before the grand jury, and how does he know who will be indicted and will be brought for trial?

Mr. LOVERING. I did not say that. Certain gentlemen who have been named in the House have made statements before the grand juries, as has been stated in the public press.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. About these gentlemen whom you say will soon be languishing in dungeons or returned to the penitentiary, how does the gentleman from Massachusetts say he got possession of the secrets of the grand-jury room?

Mr. LOVERING. I am not in possession of the secrets of the grand jury.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. How does the gentleman know that these gentlemen are to be indicted and tried?

Mr. LOVERING. Will the gentleman wait a few moments?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman if he is not a warm personal friend of Mr. Cromwell?

Mr. LOVERING. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I just wanted to know.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts happen to be a client of Mr. Cromwell?

Mr. LOVERING. Personally, no.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Have you been?

Mr. LOVERING. No.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Never?

Mr. LOVERING. No.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Are you a member of any corporation who has hired him as its counsel?

Mr. LOVERING. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. How many times?

Mr. LOVERING. Once.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. How long has he been counsel of that corporation?

Mr. LOVERING. I am not here to answer categorical questions as before a court——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I recognize this is not a grand jury.

Mr. LOVERING (continuing). And I decline to answer.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If it is any embarrassment to the gentleman, I will not ask him any further questions.

Mr. LOVERING. It is not embarrassing, but I do not think it necessary to answer these personal questions at this time.

Now, either the gentleman from Illinois has been made a victim or he is too willing to asperse the fair names of such honorable gentlemen as Mr. C. P. Taft, Mr. Douglas Robinson, Mr. William Nelson Cromwell, Mr. Roger L. Farnham, Mr. William S. Harvey, and several others.

I have mentioned no names except the name of Mr. RAINEY in the House. These other names have been mentioned in the House and in the papers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. May I not ask my friend if he will not defer the conclusion of his speech until we can get Mr. RAINEY? We have sent for him. We want to get him here, and it is to get him here that I make this request.

Mr. LOVERING. Will the gentleman be here within a short time?

Mr. WILLETT. He was here on the floor not long ago.

Mr. BURLESON. As soon as the gentleman started we sent for Mr. RAINEY. Some one else will take the floor.

Mr. LOVERING. I will yield back my time, understanding that I may go on later.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] thirty minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if it is permissible to do so, I would like to ask in the outset permission to extend my remarks so as to incorporate such authorities as I may refer to and not read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the James River Dam bill, of which I was the author and which was recently vetoed by the President, is now pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I am informed that it will probably not be reported back to the House for its action at this session. That being true, I feel that it is only just to myself and to my constituents, at whose instance and request I introduced the bill, that I should be heard briefly upon its merits and upon the questions involved in that character of legislation. I introduced it after first satisfying myself that all of my constituents living along and near the James River desired me to do so and after the Missouri state legislature had by a unanimous vote passed a joint and concurrent resolution, a copy of which I now hold in my hand, requesting Congress to enact such legislation.

I desire to read and include with my remarks an editorial upon this bill and the veto message from the Taney County Republican, which clearly expresses the opinion and feelings of the citizens of that section who are most interested in the proposed legislation, as follows:

The presidential veto of the bill permitting the utilization of the waters of James River is meeting much hostile criticism in this section, as it indicates the attitude of the administration on all similar bills, and so points to what would be done to the White River proposition. The Republican has nothing to criticise, so far as the principle upon which the President bases his action is concerned. It does criticise basing such action upon the assumption that the upper reaches of White River and James River are navigable streams. Not only are they are not navigable streams, but they will never be made such. In the interest of the southwest section of the State in particular, with rich resources of mineral and timber and wonderful adaptability to fruit raising, all lying dormant for lack of power and the transportation which the utilization of the river to generate power would soon bring to her doors, the Republican would like to see Congress pass the James River bill over the presidential veto. This section, in spite of its great resources and possibilities, is poor and the burden of taxation for local purposes heavy. Such conditions will remain until development of our dormant possibilities produces property values to help bear the burden. It does not seem to us to be just to this section to take action, the necessary result of which will be to retard its material progress and keep it tagging in the rear, while other sections in the East and South have become wealthy and prosperous by the unhampered use of their water powers to create energy. We have resources which will make of Taney and adjacent counties a region of great industrial activity and wealth, and the one thing needed and essential to bring about this consummation is cheap power and transportation. Without it we remain much in our present status for many years to come.

The bill as introduced by me was amended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to conform to its views, after which it was favorably reported to the House by the unanimous vote of that committee, and after full explanation of its provisions and its purposes, it was passed by this House at the last session of Congress by a unanimous vote. Soon afterwards the President made known his objections to that character of legislation, and indicated that he would not sign any more bills of that kind. This bill was then pending in the Senate, and the emphatic protest of the President not only delayed action upon it at that session of Congress, but led to a careful investigation of the legal questions involved by the Senate Committee on Commerce, which is composed of some of the ablest statesmen and lawyers in that body, among them Senators FRYE, NELSON, STONE, MCLAURIN, and CLARKE of Arkansas.

Mr. FLOYD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I will yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FLOYD. I will ask the gentleman if the amendment made by the committee was not in effect to make the gentleman's bill conform in all respects to the general law passed in 1906, regulating dams across navigable streams?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It was; and I will include with my remarks a copy of my bill showing that it was to be subject to the general law, which provided that the proposed dam should be constructed under the direction of the engineers of the War Department, and gives the Government the right to discontinue the dam at any time it may be necessary to use the water for the purposes of navigation.

Mr. FLOYD. Is it not provided in the general law that the Government may require the corporation or person obtaining the franchise to put in a lock or dam, or allow them to put in a lock or a dam whenever they deem it necessary for the purposes of navigation on the stream?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Absolutely so. The Government, under this bill, would have perfect and full control of the water for the purposes of navigation, and that, I contend, is the only interest the Government has in any navigable stream.

After the President's objections were perfectly understood, the entire committee recommended its passage, and it was at this session of Congress passed by a unanimous vote of the Senate, but has since failed to meet with the approval of the Chief Executive.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to criticise the President of the United States. It would be unbecoming in me as an humble Member of this House, even if I had the disposition to do so, but I have no such disposition. The President in his consideration of the bill treated me with kindness and courtesy. He invited me to see him before he finally determined what action he would take, and after hearing my statement of the facts in relation to James River, he said, in substance, that probably this bill, if it stood alone, might be meritorious and deserve his approval, but that such legislation was against his policy, and to sign it would be a bad precedent. I desire to say most respectfully that in my opinion the President is wrong in his judgment of the law and wrong in his judgment upon the facts; and that his so-called "policy," if carried out, will delay the utilization of water power along this and other rivers, that should be encouraged as one of the important agencies in the development and progress of the country and in the conservation of its resources.

He is wrong in his judgment of the law in his contention that the Federal Government has a right to impose a tax for the use of water power, even if we admit that James River is a navigable stream.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. There is a proposition which has occasioned some of us some little degree of thought, and I would like to ask the gentleman's views as to it. If the Government of the United States proposes to levy a tax upon the use of water power, it would necessarily be a direct tax; and under what provision of the Constitution could the United States Government levy a direct tax except the one which is provided for in the Constitution, that it shall be proportioned among the States according to population?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I think that is true. The gentleman from Georgia, as usual, is correct. The Senate committee in its report upon this bill holds, and the United States Supreme Court in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (158 U. S., p. 601), decides, that such a tax would be a direct tax and one that the Federal Government has no right to impose. I admit that the Government has the right to grant a license and may couple with the grant a charge for the use of any water power developed by the expenditure of public money, but that would be a charge based upon such expenditure and not a tax.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. If that proposition is true, what authority is there in Congress to impose a tax on the use of water power in the way of a direct tax? I do not grant that Congress has the right to tax at all when it does not appropriate money toward creating the dam that makes the water power.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The Government of the United States has no such power at all. The Government has no interest in the water of a navigable stream except to use it for the purposes of navigation. It has no right to tax it, and as my authority for that assertion, I will cite in my remarks a long list of unbroken decisions rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That is true with this distinction, which I think it is necessary to make: Where the Government appropriates public money to build a dam in aid of navigation or for any other purpose, builds locks and dams to create the water power, and that water power is thereby created, the Government might charge, not a tax, but charge the people for use of that power, just as it might in the District of Columbia where it built a gas plant.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. There might be some justice in that case where the Government has expended money, but the James River has never even been surveyed by the Government. It is not, in fact, a navigable stream and never can be. The Government has never expended a dollar on the stream, and never will.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In reference to the matter of taxation which the gentleman from Georgia inquired about, it is, as you know, a constitutional provision that all taxes shall be "uniform;" and is it not true that a grant made by the Government, or a license, can properly have a condition accompanying the grant, such as a money rental? If the Government should construct a dam across a river and incidentally develop water power, would not the Government have the right to lease the water power for a prescribed limit and charge for the lease? That would not be a tax, but it would be a condition that accompanied the license or grant.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. That would be demanded and might justly be paid because of the Government having expended money to create the water power, but no such condition exists in this case.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That would relieve the situation of the constitutional provision that requires taxation to be uniform. I do not hesitate to say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] that I have uniformly supported the principle I understand his bill stands for.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The Supreme Court of the United States, the highest judicial authority in the land, in a long unbroken line of unreversed decisions, has held that the only interest that the Government has in a navigable stream or in its water is to use it for the purposes of navigation, and that the title to the water, even of a navigable stream within the borders of a State, is not in the Federal Government, but in the State; and that the title to the banks and the bed of a stream after the Federal Government has parted with its riparian lands is either in the State or the riparian owner, or both, according to the laws of the respective States—and such is the settled law of the land.

This has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the following cases:

Martin v. Waddell (16 Pet., 367); Pollard v. Hagan (3 How., 212); Goodtitle v. Kibbe (9 How., 471); Barney v. Keokuk (94 U. S., 324); St. Louis v. Myers (113 U. S., 566); Packer v. Bird (137 U. S., 661); Hadrin v. Jordan (140 U. S., 371); Kaukauna Water Power Company v. Green Bay and Mississippi Canal Company (142 U. S., 254); Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S., 1); Water Power Company v. Water Commissioners (168 U. S., 349); Kean v. Calumet Canal Company (190 U. S., 452); United States v. the Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Company (U. S. Supreme Court, Apr. 20, 1908).

I desire to read some extracts from the report of the Senate Committee on Commerce in its report upon this bill, as follows:

The interest of the United States is derived from and rests upon that paragraph of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce, and this power only extends to the extent of conserving the navigability of the stream. Beyond that the Federal Government has no interest or property in the stream.

The interest of the State in the stream is derived from its sovereignty, and it holds its property in the stream in trust for all public uses, but in subrogation to the rights of the Federal Government as to navigation and of the riparian owner. The right to the use of the waters of a stream for any lawful purpose, outside of the right of navigation, belongs wholly to the State and the riparian owner. (Martin et al v. Waddell, 16 Peters, 367.)

* * * * * * *

From the foregoing statement and citation of authorities it is evident that the only use of the waters of a stream in which the United States has any property is its use for purposes of navigation. In the use of the stream for any other purpose the Federal Government has no property and hence has nothing to sell or to exact compensation for.

The plan proposed by the President would deprive the States and the riparian owners of their rights in the use of the water of a navigable stream now vested in them by law, and would concentrate the entire disposal and control in the Federal Government, a power which neither the States nor the riparian owners can, with justice or safety, for a moment concede.

An act authorizing the construction of a dam is, so far as the United States is concerned, a mere revocable license or privilege, and if a tax can be imposed on such a privilege it must be general and uniform throughout the United States. It must apply to all dams and water powers on navigable streams throughout the entire country.

Nearly all navigable streams in their upper and more remote courses are not, as a matter of fact, navigable, and in such reaches of the river dams can be erected and water powers created under State authority and State license, and so long as such dams and water powers do not materially injure or diminish the navigability of the stream in its navigable portions the Federal Government has no ground for interference. It has been customary, however, in many of such cases to apply to Congress for a federal license and the granting of it, while not necessary, serves a twofold purpose—first, that it authorizes the Federal Government, through the War Department, to control and direct the construction of the dam, and, second, that it recognizes the fact, which might otherwise require proof, that the dam will not affect the navigability of the stream in its navigable portions. (Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S., 46; United States v. Rio Grande Company, 174 U. S., 690.)

And in such cases it is of as much advantage to the United States as to the grantee of the license to have congressional action and recognition, but in such cases the Federal Government has nothing to sell and, therefore, has no moral or legal ground to demand compensation in any form.

For reasons above given the committee report the bill without the amendment recommended by the War Department.

General Mackenzie while Chief Engineer of the War Department, on April 4, 1905, in speaking of this character of legislation, said:

In connection with legislation of this kind careful consideration should be given to the question of the limitations of the power of the Federal Government over navigable waters. By virtue of its power to regulate commerce, Congress may exercise control over the navigable waters of the United States, but only to the extent necessary to protect, preserve, and improve free navigation. The Federal Government has no possessory title to the water flowing in navigable streams, nor to the lands comprising their beds and shores, and hence Congress can grant no absolute authority to anyone to use and occupy such water and land for manufacturing and industrial purposes. The establishment, regulation, and control of manufacturing and industrial enterprises, as well as other matters pertaining to the comfort, convenience, and prosperity of the people, come within the powers of the States, and the Supreme Court of the United States holds that the authority of a State over navigable waters within its borders, and the shores and beds thereof, is plenary, subject only to such action as Congress may take in the execution of its powers under the Constitution to regulate commerce among the several States.

And again, General Mackenzie says:

Regarding the proposition to empower the Secretary of War to authorize the use and development of water power at localities not improved by the United States, it should be borne in mind that natural water power—that is, power made available by the existence of natural falls and rapids in a river—is appurtenant to riparian ownership, and the right to use it is governed by state laws on the subject of private property. As above set forth, the Federal Government can regulate and control it only to such extent as may be necessary in the interest of navigation. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session, Fifty-ninth, pp. 2891–2892.)

President-elect William H. Taft, while Secretary of War, gave his indorsement to and approval of many bills of this character, and in a letter by him to President Roosevelt, giving his opinion upon a similar bill pending in the last Congress, viz, House bill 297, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of dams and power stations on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Alabama," in part, said:

It is, of course, in the interest of the public that improvements of this kind should be encouraged, and in streams in which there has been no expenditure of money to create water power it does not seem to me necessary to extend the policy of demanding compensation for such slight use of government lands as this privilege involves. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session, Fifty-ninth, p. 2892.)

The able and venerable senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], while discussing a similar bill in the Senate at the first session of this Congress, said:

Mr. President, it will be some time before a bill allowing the United States Government to take compensation for the use of water in the States will pass this body. I am prepared to show, whenever some proper bill comes before the Senate, that the Supreme Court at least thirty times in fifty years has declared that the water of rivers, navigable and nonnavigable, belong to the States and not to the General Government. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session, Sixtieth, p. 4062.)

The President is also wrong in his judgment upon the facts in assuming that James River is in fact navigable. I grant you that it may be a navigable stream in law under the authorities which hold that floating timber or rafts downstream is navigation, but the ordinary acceptation of the word "navigable" implies the possibility of running boats both up and down the river, which in this case I am reliably informed can never be done because of insufficient water and because of the rapidity of the current.

But, if we admit that James River is in fact a navigable stream, the provisions of this bill afford every necessary safeguard against any interference with its navigation. The provisions of the bill are as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to William H. Standish, of Reeds Springs, Stone County, Mo., his heirs and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam in the big bend of the James River in T. 23 N., R. 24 W., in the county of Stone and State of Missouri, across the said James River at said point and to impound at the narrows in said bend and by canal and tunnel to divert and conduct across said narrows such portion of the water in said river, through said tunnel, into said river again as may be necessary for electric power purposes, all subject to and in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall have at all times control of the use of the water, even to the extent of causing the persons, firms, or corporations taking advantage of the privileges granted herein to cease using the water whenever the same may be necessary for navigation: And provided further, That should the United States in the work of improving the aforesaid river find it necessary to flood the aforesaid tunnels, or in any way affect the flow of water through them, the owners or operators of aforesaid tunnels shall have no claim against the United States for damage on account of said flooding of the tunnels or said effect on the flow of water through them.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The question has been suggested, "Why should the Government be asked permission to construct this dam?" It is because this stream is probably in law a navigable stream, and the possibility of federal interference hereafter might deter the owners in expending the large amount of capital necessary to construct the proposed improvements.

The President is also wrong in his so-called "policy" which has caused him to veto this bill. I am glad to say that the present and future generations are, and will ever be, indebted to the President for the advanced step that he has taken to conserve the resources of our country; but his veto of bills like this, that would lessen the consumption of fuel, is an obstruction to one of the most important means of conserving our timber, oil, and coal supplies. This great and valuable water power now sought to be utilized is to-day, as it has been for ages past, going to waste, but which by proper development would furnish power for all the mills, factories, lighting plants, and electric railways now in existence for miles around, and would greatly promote the development of the country by encouraging new industries, and would thereby add to our convenience, progress, and wealth.

The President, in his veto message, expressed the apprehension that this valuable privilege might ultimately fall into the hands of some great monopoly. In answer to this objection, I desire to say that my bill was introduced for and in the name of William H. Standish, an individual citizen of my district, and one who owns all of the lands that would be directly affected by the proposed improvement. I believed then, and believe now, that he, as the owner of the soil, had the right to use the water of James River while passing through his lands, subject only to the control of the sovereign State, except that the Federal Government has the right to the use of the water for the purposes of navigation and the power to prevent any obstruction or interference with its use for that purpose.

I am, of course, not prepared to say that this right or privilege if granted may not in time be transferred and fall into the hands of some great and powerful monopoly, nor do I know of any way that such a result can be made impossible. If a heavy burden in the form of an annual tax payable to the Government were possible as a condition precedent to the granting of this privilege, it would in no way render it immune from the greedy grasp of the monopolist, but, in my opinion, adding to its cost and maintenance would rather tend to place it out of the reach of individual ownership and invite the attention and investment of great capitalists and monopolists. But, as this river and the proposed improvement would be wholly within the State of Missouri, the State would have, under the law and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the right to regulate the charges of the beneficiaries of this privilege and to protect the public from extortion. In any event, the tax paid for the privilege would become a part of the investment, upon which reasonable dividends would be expected, and would therefore fall at last as a burden upon the people.

I do not wish to be understood as favoring the giving away of any valuable right that belongs to the Federal Government or to any one of the sovereign States, but do take the position that James River is not, in fact, a navigable stream and never will be. It is wholly within the State of Missouri, and the State can and should regulate the use of its waters. The Government never did expend a dollar for the improvement of this river, and it is safe to say that it never will. I deny that it is in fact a navigable stream; but, even if it were, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Government has no right to tax the use of its water, but only to use it for the purposes of navigation.

It is for the best interests of the country that this great dormant power now going to waste should be developed and utilized, and no tax should be imposed by any authority that will prevent or obstruct its early development and use, and if any such burdens are ever imposed, it should be done in future years, after its value as an investment to the owner has been established.

Mr. Chairman, believing as I do that the Federal Government has no right to tax the use of the waters of James River, and believing that the proposed improvement would be of very great benefit to the people of my district, and knowing that my constituents living in the immediate locality of the proposed improvement were very anxious to have this bill enacted into a law, I can, in conclusion, but express the regret that the President has not been disposed to give it his approval. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, from my earliest recollection mingled tradition and reading inspired me with a great admiration for the noble red man. I often reflect that—

> Lo, the poor Indian! whose untutor'd mind
> Sees God in clouds, or hears Him in the wind—

in auricular and ocular perfection, enjoys great advantage over some of his pale-faced brethren, who are unable to see God at all, or believe anything about Him, even if they hear it. I have never failed, since my membership in this House, on any proper occasion to manifest my interest in his welfare. The first time I participated in a debate on an appropriation bill for his benefit, I demonstrated his right to the enjoyment of a sound and ample currency. At a later date I took advantage of the liberty of general debate afforded by the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill to speak of the effect of ardent liquors upon his constitution, and the possibility of finding means in the provisions of our Constitution to prevent the disastrous inroads of ardent spirits upon his constitution, as well as upon the constitutions of some other people.

At this time I wish to bring to the attention of the House the question of cotton as related to "Poor Lo," and all other people in this country and in the world, and more especially the people who raise cotton. Since the noble red man has begun to wear clothes in common with the rest of us who at different periods, more or less previous, had acquired the habit, it is entirely pertinent to the subject in hand, even without resort to the license of general debate, to suggest that cotton is the best material to supply clothing, regardless of style, fashion, quantity, or cost. Skill in manufacture is able to convert it into rivalry with all the costly fabrics known to taste and fashion, yet it is so cheap and substantial as to be adapted to use by the plainest, the poorest, and the humblest, not only for dress, but for all other of the ten thousand conceivable purposes for which fiber and textiles are used—twines, bags, bagging, awning, sails, curtains, bedding, tents, et cetera, without number. In fact, it is estimated that it has no competitor for general use that can be bought from the producer at less than 14 cents per pound, and none of them are capable of furnishing more good to the pound than cotton. It may be remarked that to say 14 cents a pound means nothing. I admit that the abstract proposition is utterly meaningless. Unless the stated price is considered in relationship to the stated prices of other commodities, it carries no significance.

The truth is that during the last season cotton was about as cheap, measured by the price of other commodities, as it was in the deplorable days twelve or fifteen years ago, harped upon so much by the Republican enemies of cotton, when the price was below 5 cents, the only thing nearly as cheap as cotton being money. The truth is the Republican party is about the greatest enemy that cotton has or ever had, and, judged by the operation of its disastrous policies, it could not have been more successful in its war upon cotton and cotton producers and those who live by cotton if the sole purpose of its organization had been expressly to put down and keep down the price of cotton. Every doctrine of the party, every step in its history, has had that tendency, though I do not believe that it was by design of all its members nor concurred in by all those who vote that ticket. My experience here has convinced me that some Republicans are good and honest men, in spite of their politics. I wish further to add, in compliment to those signal examples of greatness and excellence, despite their environment, that their goodness and greatness are in no sense attributable to any doctrine or practice of the Republican party, but that they are good and great men despite their party heresies and political environments.

I do not wish, however, at this time to enter into extended discussion of that restrictive policy which closed the markets of the world to our cotton, the product of all others which maintains for the United States the balance of trade with the world, the consequent control of both our products and our purchases by a limited number of political favorites, who by political contributions pay for the power given to rob millions of their fellowmen producing the great staple crop of the world and the great producer of wealth of the United States. I will do that at a later day. My present object is to call attention to another phase of the war on cotton. There are domestic gamblers, who for their own gain take the liberty to trifle with the interests of our people by fictitious dealings, pretendedly based on actual cotton, whereby they sell and buy hundreds of millions of fictitious bales of cotton, when not more than twelve or fourteen million bales can possibly be produced under existing conditions.

Rascality is supposed to be utterly impartial. No consideration of kinship, neighborly relations, obligations of friendship, nor any other motive can always override that of gain. I suppose that bulls and bears are equally regardless of every consideration but the hope of piling up profits. There is a peculiarity about the game that is exceedingly offensive and monotonous to the cotton producer. If the bulls would always lead the dance and keep quotations for the price of futures always on the increase, so as to induce spots to a constant upward tendency, it might be that less complaint would be heard, although in the abstract their conduct might be equally reprehensible; but to the cotton producer it looks like the bears always have the advantage in the game, and constantly keep the prices of futures quoted below the daily prices of spots, so as to produce when unaffected by other causes a constant downward tendency. That may appear all right to a man who sits in the shade and gambles on cotton like he would on the moon, regardless of which side he affects. The trouble is that such operations can not affect the moon, but they can affect the price of cotton, because manufacturers who use cotton use those quotations also.

Of course Congress can not correct human nature, though it has been appealed to for every purpose under the sun, and in some instances has done a great deal to accelerate poor human nature in its predisposition to become corrupt, and more so. We certainly could find some way to prevent the ravages of irresponsible people, who, having nothing at stake, do not hesitate to imperil the prosperity of their honest, industrious, and meritorious fellow-citizens, in taking the hazard for their own uncertain, often small, and always iniquitous gain. Right here I shall submit, as a part of my remarks, a letter from one of my constituents, one of the best men in the world, who has devoted a noble life of industry and rectitude to uplifting the agricultural interests of his section, the upbuilding of his country, the improvement, the enlightenment, and the prosperity of his race. He clearly states the case as applicable to the New York Cotton Exchange, and his appeal is a meritorious one. It is the duty of this Congress to relieve the production and commerce in cotton from the inroads and injury menaced and inflicted daily by the continued existence of the New York Cotton Exchange.

LETTERS FROM THE PEOPLE.

DUTY OF CONGRESS TO PRODUCERS.

EDITOR CONSTITUTION: In the Constitution of December 15, under the head, "Future deals may be barred," Representative POLLARD, of Nebraska, says the Agricultural Committee will hold hearings on Representative HENRY'S [of Texas] bill soon.

The New York Cotton Exchange was organized in 1870 under charter of the State of New York.

The seats were originally the property of the exchange, but later were sold outright to members and the receipts therefrom employed in the maintenance of the exchange. Since then the membership has become personal and when a member sells his seat on the exchange the proceeds belong to him individually. The prices of seats for the last few years range from $6,000 to $20,000. The membership is limited to 450. At $12,000 each, 450 seats make $5,400,000 invested in seats on the floor of the New York exchange by its members.

It is not necessary for any of its members to make or buy a bale of cotton. If the members desire to sell, the only real cotton used is what is in the paper on which the number of bales sold is written. Offers of future cotton, if not accepted at the price fixed, may be withdrawn. The members may act as bulls or bears, or may play the part of both at the same time if they desire.

In October of 1907 spot cotton was selling at 14 cents per pound. The New York Cotton Exchange got busy and sold 600,000 bales in one day, and by flooding the market with future offers reduced the price of futures and accordingly the price of spot cotton. Through the manipulations of the future market the spot market is controlled. The supply and demand for real cotton will never control the price as long as future cotton is allowed to be sold on margins. There may be a million bales of futures sold in a very short time for every bale of cotton that is produced in twelve months. The producers of cotton stand no chance with the future men.

It takes a producer twelve months to make a bale of cotton. The future men can make a million bales a minute. These million-a-minute men are making slaves of the cotton producers by compelling them to take less than cost for their cotton.

With wages high, land high, corn $1.25 per bushel, meat 13 cents per pound, and mules $200 per head, 8 or 9 cents does not pay the cost of production.

This gambling on agricultural products should be stopped. Governor Hughes, of New York, deserves praise for stopping gambling on horse racing. It was an uplift to civilization and morality, but this is only one drop in the ocean as compared with the gambling done in New York on agricultural products. This is truly straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel.

Let Congress forbid the use of the mails, telegraph, telephone, and all other public utilities in the sale of future products by margin and stop it like it stopped the Louisiana lottery a few years ago. Force all men by suitable penalties to deliver the spot products when the time comes, instead of margins. This simple act of justice to the agriculturists of the Nation should no longer be delayed by Congress. Congress should no longer let a few men, who have never produced an article of agriculture, fix their prices.

All honor to President Roosevelt for conceiving and establishing the commission on "country life." It is the part of the good Samaritan, because it is helping the needy and a great deal can be done to uplift country life. The thing that will do more than any other one thing to help the country people morally, socially, intellectually, and pecuniarily is to stop gamblers from pricing their products and let the supply and demand of real products and not of fictitious or make-believe products fix the price. Some of the States have driven out the "bucket-shop gamblers," who sold imaginary cotton by the hundred bales, but none have dared to attack the cotton-exchange gambler, who sells cotton by the million bales, but never produces or buys a bale of real cotton.

Let Congress look at the facts and apply the remedy right speedily.

A. J. SNELSON.

BULLOCHVILLE, GA., December 16.

I desire further to incorporate in my remarks a resolution adopted by the Farmers' Union of my county. That is a county distinguished for good farmers. While producing their home supplies, something unfortunately not usual, they produce an average of about three-fourths of a bale of cotton to every acre planted. Producing their own supplies and then raising all the cotton they can, as a surplus crop for profit, they, unlike most of their fellow-citizens in the South, are independent of creditors, and while not entirely independent of the baleful effects of cotton exchanges and protective tariff, they are in position to keep the wolf from the door so as to hold their cotton until they see proper to sell it. If all the cotton-growing counties would observe the first law of nature by looking to self-preservation as Carroll County, Ga., does, we would suffer less from the cotton exchanges and from the protective tariff of the Republican party. In fact, we could stand them at bay and bid them defiance. In that county I have seen thrifty farmers go upon the streets when cotton was selling too low, in their judgment, buy all that was offered, and hold it for better prices.

If the same practice of raising supplies, making cotton the surplus crop, forcing emancipation from debt, and therefore freedom from all control, could be rapidly adopted by the large majority of the cotton-producing counties, we could snap our fingers at all oppression and injustice and render cotton exchanges helpless and restrictive laws against cotton entirely nugatory. It is hardly fair, however, to expect all counties to do as well as Carroll. She has a solid white population, as pure as the purest American to be found anywhere in the United States, unmixed by objectionable immigration, untainted by heretical notions of politics or economy, and unmixed with whims and freaks. The 6,000 white landowners, producing 40,000 bales of cotton per annum, occupying fertile lands, breathing pure ozone wafted by health-giving breezes, drinking pure, sparkling water rippling from a thousand springs distilled beneath the eternal hills, gathering light from the sunshine and reflecting back from Saxon eyes the azure blue of skies more beautiful than Italy ever boasted, contribute an intelligent, virtuous, and industrious Anglo-Saxon population as pure as can be shown by any county in Old England, almost as populous, and much more prosperous.

These good people, to the number of 30,000 in that county, maintain good schools and churches, good roads and comfortable homes, so that you are never off a good road anywhere in the county nor out of sight of a comfortable farmhouse. They are willing to discharge all their duties as upright and patriotic citizens and, in addition to their local responsibilities, are perfectly willing to submit to a just and fair system of taxation at the ports for the support of the Federal Government, honestly and economically administered, but knowing that what the Federal Government pays to one set of men or permits that set of men to exact, must unrighteously be extorted from the rest of the people. They ask for no special favors themselves and object to those iniquitously accorded to others. Doing their duty themselves, they come with clean hands and clear consciences, and rightfully demand of the Federal Government that the hands of robbers be kept out of their pockets. Robbery is not rendered more moral by being legalized through the procurement of the robbers and their contributions to campaign funds. The two evils from which they suffer are prohibitory tariff, which robs both the Federal Treasury and the mass of the people, for the profit of a few beneficiaries, and speculation on the cotton exchange which, while it sometimes produces general demoralization, injuring legitimate traders and manufacturers, often engulfing in well-merited ruin the speculators themselves, always injures the producers.

Those good people, while supporting ten or twelve good towns in the county and several thousand men engaged in trade, yet boast of their devotion to agriculture, agreeing with the ancient Romans that it is the most honorable of all callings, and so believing, believe also that they are entitled to the respect and protection of that Government which they are taxed to sustain.

Though the people of that county are devoted to agriculture, there are located in the county, as is the case in a number of other southern counties, several thrifty cotton mills, almost enough to manufacture the product. They are owned and conducted largely, if not entirely, by domestic capital. At least, by capitalists who are in sympathy with the cotton producers, which build up intelligent, moral communities of operatives around the mills, make markets for local producers, and cooperate with the cotton growers in the general prosperity of the entire people.

The only protection those farmers ask is to prevent unrighteous men at home and abroad from pillaging their fields and wasting their substance. These good people, in convention assembled, passed a resolution invoking the aid of Congress to protect them against the machinations and ravages of the New York speculators. They did me the honor to personate me in the resolution which they adopted, and request that I introduce a bill to give effect to their wishes, and do what I can to pass that bill or some other having the same purpose in view, and the convention appointed a committee to deliver that resolution to me. The committee has performed its duty, and the resolution is hereby incorporated as a part of my remarks, and reads as follows:

Whereas in several States of the United States of America there are yet in full operation institutions used for the purpose of speculating in cotton and the cotton product of the South, and more especially in the State of New York are there such institutions known as "cotton exchanges" by which gambling is carried on in reference to the cotton produced in the Southern States, which, we believe and know, is detrimental to the cotton interest of the State of Georgia as well as the cotton industry of the South and of the United States.

Resolved, That we ask our Congressman, the Hon. CHARLES ADAMSON, of Carroll County and of the Fourth Congressional District of Georgia, to introduce a bill and labor with an unceasing devotion to have it passed by our National Legislature, to the effect that the cotton exchanges in all States of whatever character or anything that partakes of their nature be abolished. Further we ask that the said CHARLES ADAMSON lend every effort of his official character and his reputation to aid all similar bills by whomsoever introduced.

The above and foregoing motion carried at a meeting of the Farmers Union of Carroll County, Ga., in session at Carrollton on this the 4th day of February, 1909.

T. S. MCLENDON,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Moved and carried that C. R. Martin, president, be appointed as a committee to copy and send this resolution to the Hon. W. C. ADAMSON, Washington, D. C.

I would have introduced such a bill long ago, but many other bills had already been introduced to the same effect by other patriotic Members equally diligent, and I would be glad indeed to cooperate with my fellow-statesmen and patriots in this House to perfect and enact some legislation which would prevent the disastrous effects of speculation upon the price of raw cotton. In fact, in a previous Congress, when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] offered a joint resolution to investigate the operations of the New York Cotton Exchange, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, on which I have the honor to enjoy membership, I immediately called it up, caused it to be referred to a subcommittee of which I was a member, the Hon. WILLIAM C. LOVERING, of Massachusetts, being chairman, and reported the resolution favorably to this House.

The House ordered the investigation, which resulted in an exhaustive report by the Bureau of Corporations, in the Department of Commerce and Labor, which, it seems to me, furnishes abundant information on which to base beneficial and remedial legislation. In my judgment there would be no trouble about securing action, and proper action, if we all wanted it. I fear the trouble is that we are not all unanimous in desiring a fair price for our cotton. There are too many other people who wish to participate in the profits of the cotton business after it leaves the producer, and in their scramble for undue profits would deprive producing labor of its honest reward. There is too great a discrepancy between the price of cotton and cotton goods of every character. The difference between what the manufacturer pays the grower and what he charges the wearer of the goods is out of all proportion to what the producer receives for the raw cotton. It has long been hoped that moving the cotton mills to the cotton fields would solve the problem, but it has not yet done so. We have many cotton factories in the South, enough, I believe, to use more cotton than is used by the northern mills, but all of them are not controlled by local capital. Wherever New England mill owners control factories in the South, of course they will practically be New England mills, and operate really to protect the New England industries and prevent rather than promote southern competition.

The truth is, Republican protection as to cotton and cotton goods would come to naught if a sufficient number of cotton mills should arise in the South uncontrolled by New England interests. As long as they are so controlled they will amount to very little to help the farmer raise the price of cotton and, in fact, be distinguished mainly by the corruption of politics rather than the promotion of the cotton industry.

Sometimes error degenerates into meanness, and its manifestations grow so peculiar as to look foolish and suicidal. Last year, following a Republican panic, produced by nothing on earth but mad speculation and Republican robber protection, there were some cotton mills even in the South which had their warehouses full of manufactured goods, and cooperating with eastern spinners, had shut down their mills to wait for lower prices of cotton and higher prices of manufactured goods, saying that they had borrowed all the money from the banks that the banks could afford to loan, and if the banks should move to collect, it might break the mills and banks, although as represented by their assets, all of them were really rich. Some of those foolish men said they would have to vote the Republican ticket in order to bring better times.

The very thing that had produced their stagnation, congested their business, shut the markets of the world to their goods, prevented their cooperation by fair bargain and exchange with their fellow-citizens—the restrictive policy of the Republican party—they proposed to indorse and perpetuate, in order to secure relief, by aggravating and extending the malady. If they had been permitted to bring home some of the products of other lands they could have sold every yard of their cloth at remunerative prices, and exchanged some of the proceeds and some of their own products with their fellow-citizens for the products of the soil and the labor of hands, thereby stimulating trade at home by making it mutual, at once putting up the price of raw cotton and facilitating the sale of manufactured cotton to the general prosperity of all concerned. If any of them believed that the Republican party intended to reform after the election by relaxing any of the prohibitive duties which are still profitable to the beneficiaries, the poor, gullible creatures are doomed to a sad awakening. Their credulous faith will be rudely shattered. Intelligent people do not expect the Republican party, after having been indorsed by the people to change its policy. It can point to its recent victory as full sanction by the people of its past record and free and full license to permit similar outrages by the classes upon the masses in the future.

I invite all skeptics on this subject to await the termination of the terrific battle represented by the newspapers to be now raging in the Committee of Ways and Means between those two great tariff reformers, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the no less distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. If the balance of the people could be made to believe that there was a genuine fight between them, and everybody else would keep hands off while they hammered and pummeled each other to a finish over the tremendous difference between tweedledum and tweedledee, tariff reform would certainly be accomplished in the regulation fashion undoubtedly intended by Republican statesmen in the last campaign. But there was another way in which some of those mills could have rendered themselves useful last year while enriching themselves and the cotton growers in common. If, instead of cooperating with eastern mills to keep down the price of cotton and put up the price of manufactured goods, they had lined up with their own people, as the New England mills always do—or rather the people line up with them—they could have made themselves felt for good. For instance, they could have made an experiment in the nature of cooperation by announcing that they would sell to their own people goods by the bolt or bale at wholesale prices, and would buy cotton until they filled all their own warehouses at the highest price ruling in any market.

They would have rapidly diminished their stocks of manufactured goods and would have gotten the benefit of filling their warehouses with cotton at a moderate price just about the time the price began to rise high enough to admonish the factories in the balance of the world to replenish their supplies before the price soared out of reach. They might put this suggestion away and use it profitably on similar occasions in the future. The time will come when the cotton will be manufactured in the South by capital friendly to the men who produce the cotton, when, by cooperation, both the mills and the farmers will realize profit on their transactions, and the balance of the world will be willing to pay a reasonable price for what raw cotton they can get, and the speculators on the cotton exchange will be suppressed either by law or improved conditions, which will eliminate them, because, having nobody to gull and no material to work upon, they will find their nefarious occupation gone.

I have long wondered that English manufacturers have not moved their plants to the South. Independent of New England cabals and political interests, which have never meant anything but commercial interests, English capitalists could find a field to manufacture and operate in nowise affected by the selfish and dishonest machination of protectionists, and could profitably take advantage of the opportunity to restore some degree of justice and equilibrium to the relations between production and consumption, which can not be hoped for under present conditions. There is not enough free capital South to launch, develop, and sustain the benevolent project to occupy the field, raise the price of the staple by manufacturing it where it is produced, and ship it for trade and consumption throughout the world. New England capital will not operate there except upon conditions, political and commercial, which render the producer very little advantage, but immense detriment in a great many ways.

English spinners have long sought to secure cheap cotton and have ransacked the entire Temperate Zone girdling the world searching for soil, labor conditions, and methods that would give them cheap raw cotton. Of course, if they secure raw cotton as low as possible, then manufacture it as cheaply as possible, and sell the manufactured goods at the highest possible prices, they realize the highest possible profit. I beg to assure them that cotton in the South is cheap enough; that they will never be able to discover any of the conditions anywhere else that will produce the cotton in sufficient quantities at a lower price than it can be secured in the South. The southern farmers know how to raise cotton. They have the soil and the climate and the seasons to raise cotton, but spinners ought not to require them to raise it at a loss. A fair operating, living profit is all the cotton raisers in the South desire. If English spinners will only put their new cotton mills which they build in the future in the South, they need not trouble about bringing the labor with them. There are plenty of model factory communities, such as already referred to, to show them how to solve the labor problem.

Our native population multiplies rapidly enough to possess that goodly land now and in the future. Large families are invited to leave the farm and go to a factory, where comfortable homes are provided, adapted in size to the number in the family which occupies it, with garden for vegetables and a meadow for the cow, and a cow for milk and butter, and a yard for the pig and poultry, and a yard for flowers, and a good school and a church, and everything provided for comfort and economy, and every discouragement and prohibition provided to exclude vice and immorality. When such conditions invite, there is no difficulty about securing factory population from the country. Their intelligence rapidly enables them, with a little attention, to become satisfactory operatives. While it is impossible to beat it into the head of an obtuse Republican, and while the interested and smart Republicans already see it and try to conceal it from everybody else, it is unnecessary to tell an Englishman the great difficulty about protection, which the cotton growers have all the time realized to their sorrow.

If duties are so high that we can not bring in goods, of course we can not buy goods from other people; and if we can not buy the things that the other people produce we can not always sell them anything; and if we can not sell them anything we have no market; and if we have no market our products are worthless. English capitalists operating as I have suggested, and as I have for forty years expected them to do, would find such a course very much to their advantage.

None of the suggestions herein made would, if acted upon, operate to the prejudice of honest middlemen exchanging commodities at home or engaged in importing and exporting, but in common with all other lines of production and business those men would find activity greatly and rightfully stimulated to their own profit as well as the general good. I thank the committee for its attention.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Chairman, for over one hundred years the history of our Marine Corps has been a great part of the glorious history of our country, yet now by a stroke of the presidential pen this important arm of our national defense is in danger of being wiped out. I mean that if the order the President made on November 12, 1908, is effectively maintained it will eventually result in eliminating the Marine Corps. That fact appears from the reported hearings had on January 7 last before the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs. That order and the testimony of Secretary Newberry and of Rear-Admiral Pillsbury on this point are as follows. I quote from the report of the hearing:

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, the purpose of this examination by the subcommittee is to elicit information as to the present and prospective status of the Marine Corps, and so that we may have the information that the committee desires we have asked some gentlemen to come before us; and we will examine you first, with your permission. Now, an executive order has been issued, I understand, the result of which has been the detachment of the marines on board war ships. Is that a fact?

Secretary NEWBERRY. It is; from part of the war ships at present, and prospectively from all the ships.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Have you a copy of that order?

Secretary NEWBERRY. I have not here. I will insert it in the hearing, though. It is as follows:

EXECUTIVE ORDER DEFINING THE DUTIES OF THE UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS.

In accordance with the power vested in me by section 1619, Revised Statutes of the United States, the following duties are assigned to the United States Marine Corps:

(1) To garrison the different navy-yards and naval stations, both within and beyond the continental limits of the United States.

(2) To furnish the first line of the mobile defense of naval bases and naval stations beyond the continental limits of the United States.

(3) To man such naval defenses, and to aid in manning, if necessary, such other defenses, as may be erected for the defense of naval bases and naval stations beyond the continental limits of the United States.

(4) To garrison the Isthmian Canal Zone, Panama.

(5) To furnish such garrisons and expeditionary forces for duties beyond the seas as may be necessary in time of peace.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 12, 1908.
(No. 969.)

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Does the order specifically detach the marines from the ships?

Secretary NEWBERRY. I will have to read it. I could not tell you from memory.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. In pursuance of that order, as Secretary of the Navy, you issued a general order, did you not, on the subject of the detachment of marines from the ships?

Secretary NEWBERRY. I do not remember. It all came before I was Secretary of the Navy. I can not tell you.

Rear-Admiral PILLSBURY. Yes, sir; it was issued by your predecessor, to gradually remove them, in obedience to the President's order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. You will put into the record of the hearing, as a part of your evidence, a copy of the executive order, please?

Secretary NEWBERRY. I will; and a copy of the other order, too.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Let me hand you this copy. What is the number of that, please, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary NEWBERRY. It is a letter. The number of the letter is 942–134, dated November 18, 1908.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. And it is an order detaching marines from certain ships?

Secretary NEWBERRY. Yes, sir.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. May I make that part of your evidence, sir?

Secretary NEWBERRY. Yes. It detaches them and supplies their places.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. It is No. 942–134, signed November 18, 1908.

NOVEMBER 18, 1908.

Secretary NEWBERRY. I should say it is, but I do not know. I sign a good many orders every day.

Rear-Admiral PILLSBURY. They were all issued about the same time, for the first relief.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Then there have been a number of orders issued detaching marines?

Secretary NEWBERRY. In compliance with executive directions.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Will you be kind enough to have those orders included in your statement?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. The marines, then, were not all detached by one order, but by different orders that were issued?

Secretary NEWBERRY. I understand they were detached after a conference with the major-general, commandant of marines.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. But they are being detached by different orders?

Secretary NEWBERRY. In accordance with the exigencies of the service.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Owing to the exigencies of the service?

Secretary NEWBERRY. Yes, sir.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Is it the purpose of the department to take all of the marines off the ships?

Secretary NEWBERRY. As soon as practicable.

So, there you are, Mr. Chairman; we are confronted with the declared purpose of the Navy Department to take all the marines off the battle ships as soon as practicable, and that is to be done in pursuance of that executive order, and that means the eventual elimination of the corps. This work of the presidential pen recalls to my mind Cardinal Richelieu's exclamation in Bulwer's drama, "In the hands of men truly great, the pen is mightier than the sword," for in this instance the pen may do that which no sword could ever do.

I am not unmindful, Mr. Chairman, that the Constitution makes the President the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, but I also know that by virtue of that same Constitution the Congress "shall have power * * * to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Being given the power, the duty to use it is implied. Mr. Chairman, if the provision in the naval appropriation bill as introduced in the House, that "hereafter officers and enlisted men in the Marine Corps shall serve as heretofore on board all battle ships" had remained, the sting of the executive order would have been avoided and the Marine Corps saved, but it was stricken out on a point of order. Yesterday the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs reported the naval appropriation bill, with an amendment, the effect of which will be to restore the Marine Corps to service as heretofore on board of battle ships and armored cruisers. The Senate amendment will come back to this House for action. The question of the restoration of the Marine Corps to the kind of service which that corps has for so long a time so honorably performed will, therefore, again come before this House for consideration. It is not the first time the proposition to abolish the corps or transfer it to the army has come before the Congress of the United States; but every time it has come before Congress it has been turned down by a decisive vote of the representatives of the people. Congress has on 19 different times by joint resolution tendered its thanks to the Marine Corps or expressed its high sense of their valor and good conduct, and the greatest generals have added their tribute to those of the great naval commanders. I find the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is full of the recorded views of the most distinguished admirals in favor of retaining the Marine Corps on the battle ships. Of course we all take off our hats to Admiral Dewey, who, I understand, holds a contrary opinion, but the weight of the evidence is the other way.

Such old heroes as Hull, Decatur, Bainbridge, Biddle, Parker, Perry, Morris, Stockton, and in later days Farragut, Porter, Dupont, Sands, Rogers, Dahlgren, and the list could be extended, are all recorded in favor of retaining the Marine Corps on the ships. In the short time in which I am permitted to have the attention of the House it will be impossible for me to relate the services and the achievements of the Marine Corps, but as this is a question upon which we will again be called to act, I shall ask permission to have read and printed in the RECORD the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs made to the Twenty-seventh Congress, when practically this same question was before the House. The question came up again in the Thirty-ninth Congress, when it was again carefully considered by the Naval Committee, and a very valuable report was made after hearing the testimony of almost all the distinguished admirals of that time, and the necessity of having the marines on the ships was again affirmed. That report, also, I ask to have read and printed as part of my remarks, for it contains quotations from the testimony of the admirals of that day. Congress has always heretofore defended the Marine Corps. Let us do it again!

I ask leave to print the reports which I now send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The reports are as follows:

[House of Representatives. Report No. 243. Twenty-seventh Congress, second session.]

AUGMENT THE MARINE CORPS, ETC.

(To accompany bill H. R. 204.)

February 16, 1842. Mr. Fessenden, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report.

The Committee on Naval Affairs have had under consideration those parts of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, with the accompanying documents, which relate to the Marine Corps, and ask leave to report:

That in the opinion of said committee the number of officers and privates now allowed by law for the Marine Corps is entirely inadequate to the present demands of naval service; and they beg leave to assign, in brief, their reasons for such conclusion.

So far as the committee have been able to gather the opinions of naval men, and others most competent to form a correct judgment upon such matters, the absolute necessity of an adequate Marine Corps to the effectiveness and energetic operation of a naval force is now almost universally admitted. In addition to the acknowledged fact that every considerable naval power in the civilized world has afforded the argument of its example to this portion of its naval system, there exists at present, it is believed, but one opinion upon this subject among our own naval officers, many of whom have had ample opportunities to test the importance of marines in actual warfare. A brief consideration of the principal duties usually performed by marines, both aboard ship and on shore service, will demonstrate the correctness of these opinions.

In time of peace the marine's first and principal duty, whether at sea or otherwise, is that of a police officer. In our navy-yards he is the sentinel and guardian of the public property. Regulated as these establishments are, or should be, containing a large amount of valuable public property, the careful preservation of which for use in unexpected emergencies may be of vast importance, its guardians should be men under the efficient control of those to whom its supervision is intrusted, and subject to military accountability and rule. A different state of things has heretofore produced, and must necessarily produce, great confusion and subject those responsible for the safe-keeping of such property to great inconvenience, besides endangering the interests committed to their charge. The absence of such guardianship involves, also, the necessity of employing another description of individuals for the same purpose—irresponsible in a pecuniary point of view, free from military restraint, acting under no fear of serious consequences for neglect of duty, and at an expense often exceeding that which would be incurred by an adequate military force—while the frequent change of men employed for very limited periods increases the risk of loss, from the obvious difficulty of securing the services of those upon whose integrity and watchfulness the preservation of public property can be made safely to depend. Every consideration of prudence and economy, therefore, as well as of proper subordination and control in our naval establishments, seems to demand that in these particulars we should not vary from the universal practice elsewhere. Of what benefit, it may be asked, are our extensive navy-yards and the valuable materials collected in them if they are to be left open to the incursions of thieves and exposed to all who may be disposed to depredate upon the public property?

But if the services of a marine force are necessary at our navy-yards, on board ship they are absolutely indispensable. It is understood that a force of this description was first introduced into England with a view to the protection afforded by a trained band of soldiery against mutiny among the seamen, liable, as such bodies are, to sudden outbreaks, arising from their heterogeneous composition. It has been said, too, that the compulsory character of the service on board English vessels of war was among the principal motives for the enlistment of marines, and that as our service is voluntary we are, in consequence, relieved from any and all such necessity. In reply it may be noticed that the practice of impressment has been for many years abolished in England, but the employment of marines has not been abolished with it. In whatever motives this corps might have originated, it is evedent that the presence of a disciplined force, composed entirely of citizens accustomed to military rule, must afford great protection and tend to the preservation of order and security. All experience has confirmed the truth of this idea. And, apart from the utility of marines in such cases, their services have ever been found essential in discharging the functions of ordinary police on board ships of war, in guarding property, preserving order, and in exercising that general watchfulness and vigilance for which a mere sailor is, in some degree, unfit, except, perhaps, on extraordinary occasions. It may be remarked that, in addition, marines are relied on for the services usually performed by that portion of the complement of a man-of-war called "landsman," which is large or small, according to the number of marines, and which services include most of those discharged by ordinary seamen. From this consideration it will be obvious that as the number of the one class is increased that of the other may be diminished in proportion, and thus the naval arm may be strengthened by an efficient soldiery with little, if any, additional expense to the Nation. There is no essential difference, it is understood, between the pay of a landsman and a marine.

The preceding remarks have reference to the ordinary duties of a marine corps in time of peace. In naval warfare the importance of such a corps becomes still more apparent. It would be easy to cite numerous instances in which the meritorious and gallant efforts of this class have been warmly acknowledged and the high degree in which they have contributed to naval victories admitted. It will be sufficient, however, in this connection to enumerate some of their duties. Stationed, in time of action, in the ship's waist, commonly designated from its great exposure the "slaughterhouse," the marine is compelled to share all the danger while unable, for the most part, to participate actively in the fight. Here he is enabled by his coolness and discipline to afford encouragement to the crew on the one hand, or, on the other, should it be necessary, to enforce obedience to orders. Within musket range, his duties become of a more active nature, and there have been many instances where his accurate aim has been thought to have decided the result of a battle. He covers and repels boarders; and it may be added that not infrequently he takes his turn at the gun and supplies the loss of, or acts as relief to, those to whom that duty is appropriate in the ordinary distribution of service. The bill submitted herewith provides, it will be observed, for the instruction and improvement of the corps as marine and field artillerists.

But the labors of a marine do not end with the battle itself. In case of victory, he guards the prisoners, who are often quite as numerous as their victors. If a prize crew is put on board the taken ship, a detachment of marines must constitute a large part of it, thus showing the wisdom of providing a number adequate to emergencies of this description without impairing too much the force retained. And whenever, as often happens, it becomes necessary to land a storming party for the purpose of destroying a battery, the steadiness and discipline of trained soldiers have often been found, as must readily be perceived, of the first necessity and consequence.

Having thus briefly remarked upon the advantages to be derived from an adequate marine corps, your committee beg leave to notice the number of marines authorized by law at different periods in the history of this Government. An act passed July 11, 1798, fixed the whole number, including officers, at 877. By an act of March 2, 1799, this force was increased to 1,081. This number was further augmented in 1809 by the addition of 784 officers and privates. The act of April 18, 1814, authorized a further increase of 846. After the cessation of hostilities with Great Britain, the peace establishment of the Marine Corps was fixed by the act of March 3, 1817, at 919, including all; and such remained the whole marine force authorized by law until the act of June 30, 1834, by which the corps was authorized to consist of 1,288, officers and men.

By this review it will be noticed that since the year 1798 a marine corps has formed by legal enactment a part of the naval force of this country; and by reference to the first law passed upon the subject it will be perceived to have existed, in fact, before that time. At no time has it fallen very far short of that now established, while at some periods it has greatly exceeded the number fixed by the act of 1834. Contrasting the amount of force existing and considered necessary at these several periods, and taking into consideration the vast, though gradual, increase of our navy, the much larger extent of public property to be protected at the present day, and the growing conviction that this important arm of national defense must be rendered more efficient, together with the increasing power and wealth of this great Nation, it is obvious that the Marine Corps now authorized must fall far short of what public exigencies imperatively demand.

A little detail will render the correctness of this statement still more apparent. Naval men unite in the opinion that one marine to each gun is the smallest number required for efficiency on board a man-of-war. Great Britain allows a much larger force, and her example in such matters is surely not without its weight. The number, including officers, required on this ratio for the home squadron and vessels now actually in commission is larger than the whole authorized marine force of the country, as will be seen by the documents accompanying the report of the Secretary. Your committee are informed that it has been found actually necessary to exceed the number thus allowed in order to furnish vessels afloat with a complement of marines on the lowest scale; and in order to do this the department has been compelled to withdraw all protection of this kind from the several naval stations, leaving barely a sentinel in each, and thus exposing to depredation a vast amount of public property.

Believing, therefore, that if the navy is to be sustained it should be made efficient in all its parts, and holding it to be the extreme of prodigality not to afford ample protection to the national property accumulated at the public depots, your committee have decided to recommend an increase of the Marine Corps. They have not, however, thought it expedient to authorize so large an increase as that recommended by the department, looking, as they must, in a time of peace to the actual state of the Treasury and being desirous to go no further than the necessities of the case seem imperatively to require. Should our relations with foreign powers remain undisturbed, it is not probable that the naval force afloat will demand any immediate augmentation. Predicating their conclusions upon the data furnished by the department, but differing somewhat from the results there arrived at, it has appeared to your committee that the marine force should be increased to a larger number than that actually required for vessels in commission on the principles before stated, allowing, also, a small addition for recruits and those unable to do duty. Should our naval armament in steamships be considerably enlarged, or other circumstances require an augmentation of the force in commission, it may be necessary hereafter to come fully up to the number recommended in the documents annexed to the report of the Secretary. Should the increase provided for in the bill be authorized, your committee do not believe that the actual expense of the corps would far exceed the amount saved by the substitution of marines for other classes of men now employed by the Government; and they think it would be more than compensated by the greater security of public property now accumulated at the several naval stations, which, it is believed, can not be less in value than $20,000,000.

The bill herewith submitted provides, also, for the purchase of sites for, and the commencement of, marine barracks at Charlestown, Brooklyn, and Gosport, and for the commencement of barracks at Pensacola, where a site has been already purchased for that purpose. Barracks for the accommodation of this corps are required at all these places, none having been erected at either, and a resort being necessarily had to mere temporary arrangements of an inferior and inconvenient character, the effect of which has been to diminish the comfort and to injure the health and discipline of the corps. Should the contemplated increase be made, better provision in this respect will be indispensable; and whether increased or not, your committee are of opinion that if the Marine Corps is to exist at all some permanent arrangement should be made for its accommodation at all our naval depots where its services are required.

[House of Representatives. Report No. 22. Thirty-ninth Congress, second session.]

MARINE CORPS.

(February 21, 1867.—Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.)

Mr. Darling, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made the following report.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the following resolution passed by the House of Representatives June 18, 1866, to wit, "Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be directed to consider the expediency of abolishing the Marine Corps and transferring it to the army, and of making a provision for supplying such military force as may at any time be needed in the navy by detail from the army," beg leave to report:

The Marine Corps had its origin in the act of Congress, November 10, 1775, which authorized two battalions of marines to be raised, styled the First and Second Battalions of American Marines, with the requisite number of officers, and was the first step taken toward the creation of the naval establishment of our country. The Marine Corps, as a separate organization, is coeval with the establishment of the Navy Department by act of Congress, April 30, 1798. By act of July 11, same year, the Marine Corps was established and organized, and power given to the President of the United States to assign them to any duty on shore as, in his discretion, he might direct; and Congress, assured of the necessity for the continuance of the corps, has by subsequent acts from time to time increased its numbers and promoted its efficiency, until it has now obtained a condition of strength and usefulness which has tended greatly to the present proud position of our navy.

From the establishment of the Marine Corps to the present time it has constituted an integral part of the navy, and has been identified with it in all its achievements, ashore and afloat, and has continued to receive from its most distinguished commanders the expression of their appreciation of its effectiveness as a part of the navy.

The marines are strictly infantry soldiers trained for service afloat. Their discipline, equipment, character, and esprit de corps being that of the soldier, they necessarily give to a ship of war its military character. As sentinels, they watch over the magazines, storerooms, gangways, galleys, and all lights and fires required for the use of the ship; they guard all the public property and all prisoners of war, which at times may outnumber the crew; and at all times sustain and protect discipline of a man-of-war by their organization, distinctive character, and peculiar training. In the ordinary duties of a ship at sea they pull and haul in common with the rest of the crew; and although not required to go aloft, they keep regular watch, and are most to be relied upon to man the ropes in sudden squalls, a duty the prompt discharge of which is as necessary to the safety of a ship as reefing or furling. Marines are also trained at the great gun exercise, so that in time of action they are ready to assist in manning guns or to act as a reserve force to meet the casualties of battles. These duties being natural to, and part and parcel of, the service to which they belong, their absence from the deck would have to be supplied by an equal amount of physical force; and as some part of the crew must be kept on deck to perform these important duties, it will be readily seen why a body of well-trained men, familiar with sea life and its duties, should be preferred to soldiers drawn from the army unaccustomed to these duties. As soldiers, they guard the ship from troubles within and from surprise without; and as part of the ship's complement, take part in most of the duties necessary to her efficiency as a man-of-war.

While ashore undergoing training as soldiers they are not otherwise idle, but guard and protect the navy-yards, with the immense amount of public property within them, and are always ready for emergencies in adjacent cities. At different times this proposition to dispense with the Marine Corps has been made, and in each instance such men as Hull, Decatur, Stewart, Rodgers, Bainbridge, Biddle, Patterson, Stockton, the two Joneses, Parker, Gregory, Downes, and a host of others, ending with the heroes of the late struggle between the North and the South, Farragut, Dupont, Stringham, Dahlgren, Porter, and others, all of whom have given either written or verbal commendation, strongly expressed, of the absolute necessity of the corps, both at sea and on shore. Of their efficiency in times of mutiny or insubordination, and on land expeditions when it has been found a necessity to land on shore a military force, they have been depended upon for a rallying point for the seamen and others who may have become disorganized by the action of the enemy to rally on; and in no instance have the marines failed to do their duty, so as to draw from their naval commanders earnest approbation.

Admiral Farragut says: "I have always deemed the marine guard one of the great essentials of a man-of-war for the preservation of order and maintenance of discipline." "They work and fight their guns well." "It is next to impossible to maintain the efficiency of the ship and proper discipline without the restraints of the soldier over the sailors; and, in my opinion, to blend their duties would be to destroy the efficiency of both, and its necessity not only for the sustaining discipline on board ship, but for its manifest usefulness in shore operations."

Admiral Wilkes says: "Since the introduction of steam into our navy the necessity of a marine guard on board such vessels is greatly increased. They are the most efficient part of the crew of a steamer, and are regularly called upon to perform duties appertaining to the great guns, at which they are as proficient as sailors and landsmen, besides their ordinary duties, and are essential at all times in guarding the public property. To substitute details from the army for guards would seriously endanger the discipline and good order of all vessels, unused, as they would be, to the duties required of them, and their want of efficiency would be most seriously felt when their services would be urgently required."

Rear-Admiral Lardner says: "I do not understand why it is contemplated to transfer this valuable branch of our service to the army, but I am very sure that such measure would be a great loss and injury to the navy."

Rear-Admiral Pearson says: "By always having a sufficient number of marines at every navy-yard for the ample protection of the public property the Government would have at command a body of faithful and well-trained soldiers to assist in quelling riots in the cities near them; and the marines on such occasions have proved themselves invaluable."

Commodore Turner says: "If you please, disband or transfer it, and but a short time will elapse before there will be a clamor from every quarter for its restoration to service. In the meantime, the discipline of the naval service will suffer and ships of war cease to be what they are now—the pride of the country and the protection of its interests in every sea."

Admiral Stribling says: "The effect of abolishing the Marine Corps would, in my opinion, be very bad. So far from having a permanent body of officers and men acquainted with the naval service, will be substituted soldiers, who are entirely ignorant of the sea service."

Vice-Admiral Porter says: "If the marines are abolished half the efficiency of the navy will be destroyed. They are as necessary to the well-being of a ship as the officers. I hope for the good of the service that no attempt will be made to interfere with the corps in any way, unless to increase it. The navy would truly feel the blow. I am sure you will not find any advocate for touching the Marine Corps amongst any officers of experience in the navy."

The late Admiral Dupont says: "It should be remembered also that when undergoing such training on shore the marines are not otherwise idle, but guard and protect the navy-yards, with the immense amount of property within them, and are ready for emergencies."

Rear-Admiral Stewart says: "If we refer to the past services of the Marine Corps, they will be found to be among the most distinguished. I am decidedly of opinion that the marines can not be beneficially dispensed with in our national ships of war."

Rear-Admiral Paulding says: "I am decidedly of opinion that a well-disciplined marine guard is a very important and efficient part of the crew of a man-of-war. For the police and good order of a ship of war I consider a marine guard indispensable. Their presence at our navy-yards for the protection of the public property is deemed of great importance, and in my belief we can not get along well without them."

Rear-Admiral Shubrick says: "It is difficult to believe that anyone who can look back on our naval history for any number of years can doubt as to the necessity for and the efficiency of marines, ashore and afloat, in connection with the navy. In my opinion a good marine guard is a necessary part of a crew of a vessel of war."

Rear-Admiral Brewer says: "That my own experience in the service warrants me in the expression of my belief that it is true policy to retain the Marine Corps as an integral part of the navy, in view of its conceded efficiency, and who after one tour of service will never again, in all probability, be employed in any service connected with the navy; consequently there never can be any stable or consistent discipline observed, necesarily producing constant confusion and disorder."

Commodore Rodgers says: "I do not think that soldiers temporarly detailed from the army to serve in the navy could do the work of marines themselves, since the latter have chosen their service and are accustomed to its confinement, as well as habituated to the sea."

Commander Roe says: "It is impossible to substitute soldiers of the army for marines. The marines are sea soldiers; they are half sailors, and have a special training which the land soldiers can not have."

During the war of 1812 the Marine Corps was only composed of about 600 or 700 men, with about 40 officers, and yet in four of the most important naval battles of that war not a marine officer was killed. Probably no victory either on sea or on shore created greater rejoicing or was considered more important than the victory of the Constitution over the Guerriere; and the first officer who gave his life to his country was Lieutenant Bush, of the marines, commanding the marine guard of the Constitution. The most critical moment of that engagement was when the enemy attempted to board the Constitution, but were gallantly met by the seamen, led by First Lieutenant Morris (since well known as Commodore Morris) and Sailing Master Alwyn, backed by the marines; and here it was that Bush was killed and Morris and Alwyn severely wounded. In the ever-memorable battle of Lake Erie, Lieutenant Brooks, son of the late Governor Brooks, of Massachusetts, commanding the marine guard on board the Niagara, the flagship of Commodore Perry, was among the killed in the great slaughter on board of that vessel. And in the fight on Lake Ponchartrain (near New Orleans), under Commodore Ap Catesby Jones, the senior marine officer was also killed, thus making four-elevenths of all the officers who yielded up their lives for their country's good.

In the ever-memorable battle of Bladensburg, when nearly our whole army, mostly composed of militia, ingloriously fled, but a few marines, headed by Captain (since Colonel) Miller and Commodore Barney's force of the flotilla, kept the whole British army at bay, till there was scarcely an officer or man of our force who was not killed or wounded, and Captain Miller severely wounded and taken prisoner.

In 1825, on the occasion of insurrection at the state prison in Charlestown, Mass., where there were over 200 prisoners arrayed against the authorities of the prison, a guard of marines, under the immediate command of Lieutenant-Colonel Marston, but under the supervision of Colonel Wainwright, commanding the marines at the navy-yard, almost instantly dispersed and quelled the rioters, who, but for the timely appearance of the marines, would have probably obtained the mastery of the prison; and for many years after this occasion was often spoken of by the citizens of Boston and Charlestown to the praise of the efficiency of the marines. In numerous instances at New York, Philadelphia, and other places mobs have been quelled by the timely appearance of the marines stationed at the navy-yards of those places.

In 1836, on board of the U. S. S. Potomac, at Port Mahon, a serious outbreak of the crew occurred, which, but for the promptness of the marines in quelling it, might have resulted in very serious mutiny, and the action of the marines was a subject of commendation by the officers of the ship.

Similar testimony to the fidelity and efficiency of the marines abounds in the records of the Mexican war, at Veracruz, the City of Mexico, and elsewhere, and during the recent great rebellion, at Fort Pickens, New Orleans, Mobile, Vicksburg, Port Hudson, and in many other scenes of active conflict, the value of which may be attested by the following extract from the report of Capt. John L. Broome to the commandant of the Marine Corps at headquarters:

[Copy.]

U. S. FLAGSHIP HARTFORD,
Off New Orleans, November 17, 1862.

SIR: Under the impression that a report has been made of the part taken by the United States Marines of the fleet under the command of Admiral Farragut in the military operations on shore in the approaches to and at New Orleans in April last, I made no report to the Colonel Commandant of the Marine Corps at that time. I take occasion to correct the omission, and report the following:

On the morning of the 24th April last, and immediately after the action with Forts Jackson and St. Philip, and the destruction of the rebel fleet, the marines under my command, by order of Admiral Farragut, landed and took possession of the quarantine, at the same time taking prisoners the rebel troops, with their officers, quartered in the quarantine buildings, and hoisting the flag of the United States on the same. Admiral Farragut having determined to take military possession of the city of New Orleans until the arrival of the troops of the United States Army under General Butler's command, a battalion of United States Marines under my command, about 250 strong, were disembarked from the fleet on the 29th of April last, and marched to the custom-house, where I detailed Capt. Adam Ramsay with a detachment of marines to occupy the custom-house and guard the United States flag, then about to be hoisted on the building. At this juncture the marines were joined by two howitzers, manned by seamen, in charge of Midshipmen J. H. Read and E. C. Hazeltine, from the flagship Hartford. After occupying the custom-house, I received orders from Commodore H. H. Bell, senior officer present, to march the marines to the city hall, a distance of about half a mile from the vessels of our fleet, and near the center of the city. On arriving at the city hall I directed Lieut. John C. Harris with a guard of marines to occupy the building and enforce order there while the rebel flag was being hauled down from the flagstaff on the city hall. After performing this duty, the marines were marched to the place of embarkation, and returned to the fleet, except the marines quartered in the custom-house, who were retained there for the purpose of guarding the United States flag. When the troops of General Butler's command landed at New Orleans on the 1st of May last, the force of marines on duty in the city returned to the fleet.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN L. BROOME,
Captain, Commanding Marines, Gulf Squadron.

Col. JOHN HARRIS,
Commandant, United States Marine Corps,
Headquarters, Washington, D. C.

England and France, but especially the former, have not only marines as infantry, but a distinct corps of marine artillery, and each of their line-of-battle ships has four fieldpieces and their frigates two, so that in case of their landing a military force they are never without that arm for the field to which the first Napoleon owed so many of his victories. France has also an efficient body of marines, and so have other nations.

The committee are of opinion that the employment of marines produces a far greater degree of efficiency in the military force of the country, and that they are far better adapted to the peculiar duty which they are called upon to perform than could be obtained by soldiers, who are liable to frequent changes and entirely unpracticed in sea service, while as a matter of economy little, if anything, could be saved in expense by dispensing with the Marine Corps.

An equal and probably a greater number of soldiers would be required to perform the service now done by marines, with corresponding pay and rations. From the beginning, this corps seems to have fully and satisfactorily fulfilled the purpose of its organization, and no good reason appears either for abolishing it or transferring it to the army; but, on the contrary, the committee recommend that its organization as a separate corps should be preserved and strengthened. The Marine Corps now numbers upward of 90 officers, and about 3,600 rank and file, making a command more than three times in number that of a colonel in the army, who is still subject to several officers of superior grade, yet the highest officer in the Marine Corps ranks only as a colonel. Nearly every corps and department of the army, if not every one, including the staff, some of which have comparatively few men, has a brigadier-general or higher officer at its head. Such is the case with the Engineer Corps, Chief of Ordnance, the Quartermaster's, Paymaster's, and Medical departments, while the head of this important corps of nearly 4,000 men ranks only with a colonel in the army and captain in the navy.

The committee are of opinion that justice to this officer, the proper assimilation of the corps to the military and naval branches of the service, and the encouragement which this recognition of the importance of the corps would give to both officers and men require that its commanding officer shall hold the rank of a brigadier-general.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, on this the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln I do not think that anything could be discussed that is more appropriate than that which is of benefit to the general public, and especially the poorer members of the general public. If Abraham Lincoln was here to-day a Member of this House, charged, as he would be, with legislating for the District of Columbia, I believe that he would be interested in what I expect to discuss, as he was a man of such broad sympathy, a man of the people, a man who sympathized with those who had to labor. He was in sympathy with those who earned their bread by the sweat of their faces. He was in favor of anything that would make the burdens of life lighter and smooth the pathway of those who have to earn their living by daily toil. In this capital of the Nation it seems to me, as we have the exclusive right to legislate for it, that in all legislation we should look to the interest of the great majority of the people who live here and must ever live here, and in the very nature of things the population of this city will always consist largely of government employees. There will be more of these people in the future than there are now. It is also true that gentlemen of large wealth and fortune come here to live because of the advantages it gives as a capital, but to them economic considerations will not appeal, because they are able to live without them.

A few days ago I discussed before the Committee of the Whole the question now agitating this Congress pertaining to proposed gas legislation. There is to-day almost a pall settled over the people of this District because of the charge that they are using a very dangerous and poisonous gas. That has been caused, in part, by the testimony of a learned gentleman in the employ of the United States Government, one holding high official position, Doctor Wiley. I wish to read what he said about water gas or carbureted water gas. Answering a question from Mr. TAYLOR, at the hearings before the District Committee, Doctor Wiley said:

It will take six times as much of it—

Referring to coal gas—

at 5 per cent to kill a man as it would 30 per cent, and the effect would be so great—that the odor of gas would probably wake up and inform them of their danger while they were still alive. They would live overnight with the coal gas, whereas they would be dead in the morning with the other gas, which is of higher percentage in carbon monoxide.

Referring to coal gas—

His testimony was given in a hearing on a bill which was pending before the District Committee limiting the carbon-monoxide gas to not over 10 per cent, and he states on the average that coal gas has only 5 per cent of this carbon monoxide. Therefore a gas with 30 per cent of carbon monoxide is six times more dangerous than coal gas.

I said the other day that if we pass any of these bills—and I see one was introduced in the Senate—to limit carbon-monoxide gas in gas used in Washington, not to exceed 10 per cent, it absolutely excludes water gas altogether, and that there were only two other sources of supply. One to manufacture coal gas exclusively—which runs, on the average, 5 or 6 per cent of carbon monoxide—and the other is to use natural gas. The other day my mind was diverted from the consideration of natural gas, which I intended then to discuss, and that is what I expect to discuss to-day. Man has no material that is commercially available to him with which to make gas that will contain less than 5 or 6 or 7 per cent of carbon monoxide. In the eternal hills of West Virginia, of Pennsylvania, of Ohio, of Kansas, and other States, in the laboratory of nature, a gas is made which is shown by expert testimony before our committee, on an average of 16 analyses, to contain only six-tenths of 1 per cent of carbon monoxide, or, speaking in round numbers, only one-half of 1 per cent. Ever since I have been serving on the District Committee, it has appeared strange to me that a large city like this, so near the natural-gas fields as we are, is limited to the consumption for fuel purposes of gas 22 candlepower, at $1 per thousand cubic feet. Here we must pay $7.25 a ton for anthracite coal with which to operate cooking ranges.

Now, is it or is it not possible, is it or is it not practicable to pipe natural gas to Washington City from West Virginia, or Pennsylvania, or Ohio, or Oklahoma, or Kansas, or wherever it is found in sufficient quantity? I have no expert knowledge on that subject, but I will read first what Dr. John K. Haywood, an expert from the Bureau of Chemistry in the Department of Agriculture, says in reference to carbon monoxide in natural gas. On his first appearance before the committee that question was asked him and he said he was not at that time ready to answer it. He answered it the next day and here is what he said:

I was not able to give that information at the time, but I believe Mr. Goldsboro volunteered the information that natural gas contained a large amount of carbon monoxide.

Mr. GOLDSBORO. No; just the contrary.

Doctor HAYWOOD. I was going to say that if he did say that, he was wrong, because natural gas contains only on an average of 16 analyses, taken from all parts of the United States, six-tenths of 1 per cent of carbon monoxide.

Now, with so low a percentage of carbon monoxide, practically one-half of 1 per cent, I do not see how it would be possible to have an accident in the use of natural gas that will result in death. It is true it is not an illuminating gas per se. If it is used for illuminating purposes the mantle would have to be used, though I do not know as to that. It could not be used for illuminating purposes, I understand, as well as coal or water gas.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, yes. It has been used for twenty years.

Mr. SIMS. My friend the gentleman from Ohio, General KEIFER, says it has been used for twenty years, and therefore I have the information that it can be used for all purposes for which any other gas may be used. Now, why not take this God-made gas that has, as all the things the Creator makes, less of evil in it, less of danger, than anything that man can make, and bring it to the city of Washington? That was one of the reasons why the last paragraph appears in the bill I introduced, which was to provide that just such a thing might be done—that gas companies here might acquire supplies of coal or other material used in making gas.

Now, while this matter is before Congress and being considered, why not give this company, if it so desires, or any other company, the privilege of bringing natural gas to Washington City? If it can be used at the price it is furnished other cities, it will supplant all other kinds of fuel. I do not hesitate much to say that it can be brought and served in this city at not exceeding 30, 35, or 40 cents per thousand cubic feet. Why should other cities, looking to their own interests, have this natural gas, freer from poison than any other gas, at one-third of the price that people here have to pay? Why not have it in Washington?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague tell the committee why it is that we are unable to get a bill such as he suggests? Why does not his committee bring in a bill such as he suggests, at least partly relieving the manufacture from this deadly gas?

Mr. SIMS. I will answer my colleague by saying this, that the people here, like Members of Congress, had but little knowledge upon the subject and did not really know, I am confident, anything about gas—whether made of water or coal, or what percentage of carbon monoxide it contained—until an investigation was brought about by the Department of Agriculture through Doctor Wiley, Doctor Haywood, and Doctor Skinner.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. When did we make that discovery?

Mr. SIMS. It was in this way: The papers have been full of it, and a discussion was engaged in the other day, and no doubt my colleague was not present. There were three persons died here from gas poisoning named Bremmerman. The coroner's jury referred the matter of the quality of Washington gas to the Department of Agriculture for analysis, and the analysis was made. In all the samples analyzed none ran below 22 per cent and some of them as high as 29 per cent carbon monoxide. Now, the evidence before our committee has been absolutely conclusive that this company nor any other company can manufacture carbureted water gas and mix it with coal gas so as to contain less than 10 per cent of carbon monoxide. The commissioners prepared and sent up a bill requiring that gas used in the District of Columbia furnished by any company should not contain exceeding 10 per cent of carbon monoxide.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many days or weeks has it been since these chemists made this investigation?

Mr. SIMS. It was along in December or January; I do not remember; but a bill reducing the carbon monoxide to 10 per cent was introduced a very short time after the report was made public. The gentleman will remember there was a special message of the President——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It has been that length of time since the head of our pure-food bureau, and these other chemists made that report, and the committee has been unable to get a bill reported.

Mr. SIMS. We have been having hearings.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why not stop the hearings and report a bill?

Mr. SIMS. I will inform the gentleman why the hearings have not been completed. In the first place, we had hearings of Doctors Wiley, Skinner, and Haywood. They gave statements and facts. In all justice to the gas companies, they were entitled to be heard. Three witnesses were furnished by them—the gas commissioner of Massachusetts, the chief gas inspector of New York, and another expert, Mr. Forestall—I do not know whether he holds an official position or not. They admitted the difference in the poison of the two gases, but contended that in actual use an exposure of either gas, if long enough, would produce death; that the exposure resulting in death usually came at night when people were asleep, and usually long enough to cause death with either coal or water gas.

While they admitted the poisonous contents they contended that practically but few more fatalities resulted from the use of one than the other. It was also shown that the water gas of Washington is as harmless as water gas can be made, and that it is distributed in as safe a manner as it can be done. It was shown that New York uses water gas, that Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, Boston—that, in fact, all the large cities, or nearly all of them—use water gas to-day. Naturally the gas companies of those cities are interested in opposing any legislation which will discriminate against water gas for fear it will react upon them in their own cities.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to say the other cities are opposing the attempt to get rid——

Mr. SIMS. I do not know. I say they are naturally interested in protecting the use of water gas. These witnesses so admitted, as a man engaged in manufacturing an article would be interested; necessarily they are interested.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now then, has not the city got enough evidence, those who favor——

Mr. SIMS. Let me get through. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia stated that they had no money with which to subpœna witnesses to sustain the Department of Agriculture in rebuttal of the testimony of these experts.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What do we want with that?

Mr. SIMS. Let me get through, and then perhaps the gentleman can decide better. A resolution was introduced by the chairman of the District Committee asking to have the expenses of witnesses summoned for the purpose of investigation of the poisonous nature of water gas to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. The House passed the resolution. This additional evidence was asked for by the commissioners in support of Doctor Wiley's testimony, upon the theory that these experts had to some extent overbalanced as a practical question the advice given by the government expert.

Let me go back to natural gas. I want to refer you to the Natural Gas Company, of Kansas, which has capital stock, $12,000,000; bonds, $6,928,000. It draws from 300 wells. Miles of pipe line, 1,250. Amount of gas furnished, $3,000,000 in 1907. Price, gross, domestic, per 1,000 feet, 25 cents. Now, look at the cities furnished by this one company. See how scattered they are and what a vast territory there is lying between them. This company supplies Kansas City, Topeka, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Atchison, Ottawa, and about thirty-two smaller towns in Kansas, and St. Joseph, Carthage, Joplin, Webb City, Galena, and other towns in Missouri. I do not know absolutely the distance that any of these towns are from the source of supply, but I have been informed by one of the Members from Missouri that some of the gas comes at least 300 miles.

Here is the Manufacturers' Light and Heating Company, of Pittsburg; capital authorized, $25,000,000; issued, $21,500,000; bonded indebtedness, $7,000,000; pays 6 per cent interest. Wells drawn from, 1,208; miles of pipe lines, 2,982; number of meters supplied directly, 66,183; price of gas, net, per 1,000 cubic feet, domestic, 25 to 30 cents; industrial, 8 to 22 cents.

There are others along this line. I find hardly any natural gas supplied to domestic consumers that exceeds 25 or 30 cents per 1,000 feet. Here are nearly 3,000 miles of pipe line in the case of the last company I have named.

Now, with great supplies in West Virginia, why can not the present gas companies, if they are permitted and so desire, bring natural gas to the city of Washington, with a limitation upon the price not exceeding 30 or 40 cents, whatever may be shown to be reasonably profitable, and let the people be rid of smoke and cinders and ashes and the high price of coal in this city for all cooking purposes and heating purposes?

What looks better than a natural-gas log burning in an open fireplace? What is better, and what gives more cheer and comfort and pleasure? The bringing of natural gas to the city would absolutely eliminate the possibility of gas poisoning in the District of Columbia. These experts have shown, at least that was their testimony, that in cases they had examined the length of exposure had been sufficient to have resulted in death even from coal gas.

Now, some may contend that the companies will have to use different sets of pipes. Perhaps so; but the natural gas of these neighboring States—Maryland, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Ohio—may not be exhausted in a thousand years. We do not know how long, and why not, while we have got this subject up, place amendments on these bills that will allow the Washington Gaslight Company or any other company to give this service which is so much needed? [Applause.]

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I again yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING].

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield to me thirty seconds?

Mr. MARSHALL. I have yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING].

Mr. RAINEY. I only want thirty seconds.

Mr. MARSHALL. With Mr. LOVERING's consent; yes.

Mr. RAINEY. I have returned to the House, Mr. Chairman, because I have been advised over the telephone that a personal attack has been made on me. I regret it will be impossible for me to remain until the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING]. I have accepted an invitation to make a speech this evening in another city, and the committee is now awaiting to escort me there. It will only be possible for me to remain a few minutes; but I will answer the gentleman at the first opportunity, if it appears, on reading the RECORD, that he requires an answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, proceeding from where I left off, is it fair for Members of this House, who under the Constitution enjoy the privilege of free speech, to repeat on the floor of this House vague rumors against gentlemen where they can neither reply to nor call Members to account for their words? There is evidence sufficient and incontestable to convict the blackmailers, who have tried to work their sand-bagging game not only on the gentlemen I have named, but on both the political parties.

Last fall when the election was absorbing the public attention, and party feeling was running high, they tried to sell their dirty stories to the Democratic campaign committee and to certain leaders of the Democratic party; and it is a fact that the national Democratic committee had them under consideration for a long time, but being unable to substantiate them with any reliable proofs, they were not used as campaign material, much to the credit of that party.

For nearly two years these same villains had been pursuing Mr. William Nelson Cromwell, with the expectation that he would pay them a large sum of money—$5,000 to $25,000—to have them suppressed.

They were always met by him with an indignant refusal and the reply that they might do what they pleased with their stories, for they were nothing but lies.

Finding that they could do nothing with him on his own account, and knowing that he was deeply interested in Mr. Taft's campaign, they thought he would submit to paying something rather than to have any publicity at that time, as they said to him, "Even though there is no truth in the story, buy it and bury it." So sure was Mr. Cromwell of his own position and so conscious of his own integrity in all these matters that he did not believe that anything they could do or say would in any way injure Mr. Taft.

It was at that time, when they had failed in all their demands upon Mr. Cromwell, that they took their nefarious wares to Mr. Mack, chairman of the Democratic national committee, and offered them for sale for campaign purposes. Yet, while they were not accepted for the reason I have stated, that they were lacking in the means of proving them, we see by the clipping from the World, which I have just read, that members of the Democratic party did enter into an agreement with Mr. RAINEY to exploit the subject on the floor of this House.

This he has attempted to do by introducing his resolution of inquiry, but, singularly enough, for some reason or other he has not seen fit to push the resolution nor, so far as we know, has he taken any steps to bring about any investigation. Has he fallen down?

Has he failed to secure his proofs? Have his informants forsaken him?

After these professional blackmailers (for it is known that many of them were professional) had failed to extort money from any of these sources, they did in sheer desperation cause them to be published, and they appeared in the New York World. Whether that journal paid anything for them or not I can not say.

Whether Mr. RAINEY got his information from the New York World or directly from these blackmailers, that is a matter——

Mr. RAINEY. I want to say to the gentleman I received no information from either source.

Mr. LOVERING. What does the gentleman know about either source I refer to?

Mr. RAINEY. I have not had the pleasure of hearing your remarks until this moment.

Mr. LOVERING. The gentleman will see them in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

Mr. RAINEY. I know nothing about any blackmailers, nor have I received any information from the New York World.

Mr. LOVERING. The gentleman will have an opportunity to make a reply when he sees what I have already said. The gentleman at least will have an opportunity to state to the House where he did get his information.

Mr. RAINEY. Did the gentleman prepare the manuscript he is reading, or did Mr. Nelson Cromwell?

Mr. LOVERING. Every word I prepared myself; nor has Mr. Cromwell seen it.

Mr. RAINEY. Did he put the gentleman in possession of the facts?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOVERING. I much prefer to proceed; and the gentleman will have full opportunity to make a full reply.

Mr. Chairman, I have been familiar with the Isthmian Canal question ever since I entered Congress twelve years ago.

When the canal commission which was appointed to examine all of the proposed routes returned from its visit to the Isthmus in 1901 and made its report, it was easy to see that if the Panama Canal and the concessions to the French company could be purchased for $40,000,000 it would be the best proposition for the United States Government. At that time I had several conferences with the late George S. Morrison, who, to my mind, was one of the ablest engineers who has ever had anything to do with the interoceanic canal question.

I also found that Mr. William Nelson Cromwell understood the subject thoroughly in all its details.

At that time I made almost the first speech in Congress in favor of the Panama Canal.

At this point I desire to say a word about Mr. William Nelson Cromwell, who has been the subject of much unwarranted criticism, misunderstanding, and misrepresentation. Mr. Cromwell was at that time the counsel for the French company. And he used his best efforts and all proper means to serve his clients, as, indeed, he was bound to do. He was also counsel for the Panama Railroad, and was active (as he always is in everything he undertakes) in the transactions between the United States Government and the French company.

All this is well known.

There have been no secrets, notwithstanding suspicious minds have been disposed to imagine there were.

I have this to say, that I have been in pretty close touch with Panama Canal matters for many years, and also with Mr. Cromwell, and I have never known of his doing a single improper act in connection with this or any other transaction whatever, either in this country or France or on the Isthmus.

In this matter I believe that everything he did was honorable, straightforward, and absolutely without any self-seeking interest beyond what should properly come to him as a legitimate fee for his services.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOVERING. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts, who says that there were no secrets in the Panama Canal transaction, justify the refusal of William Nelson Cromwell to answer questions put to him by one of the great committees of Congress concerning these transactions?

Mr. LOVERING. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman refers to an investigation before a Senate committee, I understand, two years ago. Mr. Cromwell answered every single question he was at liberty to answer in faith to his own client. Since that time conditions have so changed in regard to suits then pending that nothing has been kept back since, and the whole state of the case is well known to everybody.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman too much, but is it not a fact that at that time Mr. Cromwell attempted to and claimed the right to decide for himself whether the questions were proper, and the committee considered all the facts and overruled him, and that an order was about to be issued to require him to answer the questions as propounded, when the great Senator who was prosecuting the inquiries died and put a stop to the matter?

Mr. LOVERING. No; Senator Morgan did not die until a long time after Congress had adjourned. I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to go back of the facts. What happened at that time happened; they did not hale Mr. Cromwell to the bar of the Senate; they did not compel him to state what he had no right to state, or tell the secrets that had nothing to do with the United States and had nothing to do with the probity of his own position.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman deny that the committee voted to require him to answer the question?

Mr. LOVERING. Why did not they force him to?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They were taking steps to do so. I do not see how the gentleman can maintain that there were no secrets——

Mr. LOVERING. I must decline, Mr. Chairman, to pursue this discussion any further, because it is a side matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield further.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Cromwell did not profit directly or indirectly, in any form or manner, from any part he took in these matters, beyond receiving a very moderate compensation for his services to the French company.

I believe that while he served his clients faithfully on the one hand, on the other he was absolutely patriotic and never for a moment forgot that he was first of all an American citizen.

Any statements to the contrary, I believe, are utterly unfounded and unwarranted, both as relate to Mr. Cromwell or these other gentlemen who have been attacked.

I call upon the gentleman from Illinois to produce here and now the proofs he claims to have to support his charges against these gentlemen, the President-elect, and against President Obaldia and the Panama Legislature.

If he declines to do this, then let him push his resolution of inquiry for adoption, and let us have a full and complete investigation of all matters concerning the Panama Canal.

If there is any crookedness, let us have it unearthed, and if there is to be any censure let it fall where it belongs.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOVERING. For a question.

Mr. RAINEY. I understood the gentleman to call upon me a while ago to produce certain proofs now and here. I stated on the floor a moment ago that it was impossible for me to remain until the speech of the gentleman is over, but I desire to assure the gentleman, as I did a moment ago, that at the earliest opportunity, after reading the gentleman's speech in the RECORD, I will proceed to answer it to the best of my ability and to produce what proofs I am able.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois does not wish to pursue either of these courses, then it remains for him to do the fair and manly act of withdrawing his charges and admit that he has been misled, and, above all, let him make a proper apology to President Obaldia and the Panama Government. [Applause.]

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] forty minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman to allow me to yield to a gentleman on this side.

Mr. MARSHALL. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that we have been very courteous on this side, and they have broken up our programme to some extent, and I would like to go on.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, if I may, I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Abraham Lincoln.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, at a time like this, when every head is bowed in reverential awe in memory of Abraham Lincoln, that great sympathizer with the plain people, it is perhaps not inappropriate to submit to the House and the country certain quotations from his writings not often quoted. From these it will plainly be seen on which side his sympathy and influence would be bestowed were he called upon to pass upon the burning question of to-day.

LINCOLN—LABOR AND CAPITAL.

It is not needed nor fitting here that a general argument should be made in favor of popular institutions; but there is one point, with its connections not so hackneyed as most others, to which I ask brief attention. It is the effort to place capital on an equal footing with, if not above, labor in the structure of government. * * * Labor is prior to, and independent of, capital. Capital is only the fruit of labor, and could never have existed if labor had not first existed. Labor is the superior of capital, and deserves much the higher consideration. * * * No men living are more worthy to be trusted than those who toil up from poverty; none less inclined to take or touch aught which they have not honestly earned. Let them beware of surrendering a political power which they already possess, and which, if surrendered, will surely be used to close the door of advancement against such as they, and to fix new disabilities and burdens upon them till all of liberty shall be lost. (From Annual Message, December 3, 1861.)

It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing bread from the sweat of other men's faces. (Inaugural address, March 4, 1865.)

And inasmuch as most good things are produced by labor, it follows that all such things of right belong to those whose labor has produced them. But it has so happened in all ages of the world that some have labored, and others have, without labor, enjoyed a large proportion of the fruits. This is wrong and should not continue. To secure to each laborer the whole product of his labor, or as nearly as possible, is a worthy object of any good government. (Complete Works, vol. 1, p. 92.)

I am glad to see that a system of labor prevails in New England under which laborers can strike when they want to, where they are not obliged to work under all circumstances. (Speech at New Haven, Conn., March 6, 1860.)

The strongest bond of human sympathy outside the family relation should be one uniting all working people of all nations, tongues, and kindreds. (Reply to committee of Workingmen's Association of New York, March 21, 1864.)

Allow all the governed an equal voice in the government; that, and that only, is self-government. * * * Finally, I insist that if there is anything that it is the duty of the whole people to never intrust to hands other than their own that thing is the preservation and perpetuity of their own liberties and institutions. (Speech at Peoria, Ill., October 16, 1854.)

THE RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE.

I am opposed to the limitation or lessening of the right of suffrage. If anything, I am in favor of its extension or enlargement. I want to lift men up—to broaden rather than contract their privileges. (Interview, Springfield, Ill.; Herndon, p. 625.)

LINCOLN'S IDEA OF FREE GOVERNMENT.

You can better succeed with the ballot. * * * Let there be peace. Revolutionize through the ballot box and restore the Government once more to the affections and hearts of men by making it express, as it was intended to do, the highest spirit of justice and liberty. (1855, Advice to Free Soilers who talked of using force; Herndon, p. 380.)

THE MAN BEFORE THE DOLLAR.

* * * The Democracy of to-day hold the liberty of one man to be absolutely nothing when in conflict with another man's right of property. Republicans, on the contrary, are for both the man and the dollar, but in case of conflict the man before the dollar. * * *

But soberly, it is now no child's play to save the principles of Jefferson from total overthrow in this Nation. * * * This is a world of compensation, and he who would be no slave must consent to have no slave. Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and, under a just God, can not long retain it. All honor to Jefferson—to the man who, in the concrete pressure of a struggle for national independence by a single people, had the coolness, forecast, and capacity to introduce into a merely revolutionary document an abstract truth, applicable to all men and all times, and so to embalm it there that to-day, and in all coming days, it shall be a rebuke and a stumbling block to the very harbingers of reappearing tyranny and oppression. (Letter to Republicans of Boston, April 6, 1859, in reply to an invitation to attend a celebration in honor of Jefferson's birthday.)

I have often inquired of myself what great principle or idea it was that kept this confederacy so long together. It was not the mere matter of the separation of the colonies from the mother land, but that sentiment in the Declaration of Independence which gave liberty, not alone to the people of this country, but, I hope, to the world for all future time. It was that which gave promise that in due time the weight would be lifted from the shoulders of all men. (Speech at Independence Hall, Philadelphia, February 22, 1861.)

Think nothing of me; take no thought for the political fate of any man whomsoever, but come back to the truths that are in the Declaration of Independence. While pretending no indifference to earthly honors, I do claim to be actuated in this contest by something higher than an anxiety for office. I charge you to drop every paltry and insignificant thought for any man's success. It is nothing; I am nothing; Judge Douglas is nothing. But do not destroy that immortal emblem of humanity—the Declaration of Independence. (Speech at Bardstown, Ill., August 12, 1858.)

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

The assertion "that all men are created equal" was of no practical use in effecting our separation from Great Britain; and it was placed in the Declaration, not for that, but for future use. Its authors meant it to be—as, thank God, it is now proving itself—a stumbling block to all those who in after times might seek to turn a free people back into the hateful paths of despotism. They knew the proneness of prosperity to breed tyrants, and they meant, when such should reappear in this fair land and commence their vocation, they should find left for them at least one hard nut to crack. (Speech at Springfield, Ill., June 26, 1857.)

LIBERTY.

The fight must go on. The cause of civil liberty must not be surrendered at the end of one or even one hundred defeats. (Letter to H. Asbury, November 19, 1858.)

The candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of that eminent tribunal. (Inaugural address, March 4, 1861.)

THE COURTS AND THE PEOPLE.

The people of these United States are the masters of both Congresses and courts, not to overthrow the Constitution, but to overthrow the men who pervert the Constitution. (Speech at Cincinnati, Ohio, September 17, 1859.)

All the armies of Europe, Asia, and Africa combined, with all the treasure of the earth (our own excepted) in their military chest, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not by force take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge in a trial of a thousand years.

At what point, then, is the approach of danger to be expected? I answer, if it ever reach us, it must spring up among us; it can not come from abroad. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of freemen we must live through all time or die by suicide! (Speech at Springfield, Ill., January 27, 1837.)

We will hereafter speak for freedom and against slavery as long as the Constitution guarantees free speech; until everywhere on this wide land the sun shall shine, and the rain shall fall, and the wind shall blow upon no man who goes forth to unrequited toil. (1856, History of Abraham Lincoln; Arnold, p. 97.)

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I apologize to you and to the Members of this House for violating the spirit of the code of ethics in this great body by asking that you hear me, when there are so many others who, by priority of service and superiority of statemanship, are entitled to the time allotted to me; and yet I would be false to the interests of the quarter of a million of people whom I represent if I did not raise my voice and cast my vote against the reign of extravagance and the growth of greed that is blighting the possibilities of all but those "on the inside, looking out," and getting much of its inspiration from official tendencies to make office seeking and office holding a commercial enterprise, rather than a call to public duty and a badge of honor.

Every conspiracy against good government and every license for imposition on a defenseless public bases its rights to do its worst upon some statutory or executive precedent in government and, when we, here, the greatest lawmaking body for the greatest cosmopolitan populace of enterprise and freedom on earth, sanction the suggestion that public officials should be paid exorbitant salaries we simply invite the vampires of our commercial life to prey more ravenously upon the fruits of honest toil and encourage avarice to renewed citations of the pernicious doctrine, that it is the fixed policy of our country and its people to "get dollars; get them honestly if you can, but get them."

We, all of us, fully understand that there is a rapidly growing spirit of protest among our constituents against the increase in extravagance in the public service. And this is not inspired by the so-called "chronic knocker." It comes from intelligent men of the shop, farm, and business house everywhere, and it comes regardless of party affiliations or personal vocation.

Why this growing protest from the masses of our country? Why should we, sirs, we who are chosen representatives of the best interests of the people of the United States, give cause for this widespread and almost universal appeal to stop the colossal increase of public extravagance as a safeguard to public and private welfare in all the diversified branches of industrial and financial endeavor?

Let us look at some of the figures Congress is authorizing as legitimate and necessary expenses in conducting this Government. For instance, it is given out as statistical fact that the President's salary is $50,000 per year; his clerk hire, $69,200 per year; his contingent fund, $25,000 per year; his traveling expenses, $25,000 per year; his maintenance for the White House, horses, vehicles, stables, and so forth, $35,000 per year; White House grounds, $9,000 per year; fuel, $6,000 per year; care of greenhouses, $9,000 per year; repair of greenhouses, $3,000 per year; printing, $2,000 per year; lighting the White House residence and grounds, $510 per year—a grand total of $234,430 per year, with 40 paid police guards besides. And now we have a bill pending and favorably considered which provides that the President's salary of $50,000 shall be increased to $100,000, although the argument is ridiculously made that this will be an increase for the President and a saving for the Public Treasury. In the name of reason, is not $50,000 per year, with $184,430 incidental official and living expenses, a fair compensation for our Presidents? The advocates of salary increase say the President, Members of Congress, and federal judges can not live in keeping with the dignity of their positions and save any money at the salaries they have been receiving heretofore. If this be true, the philosophy of Abe Martin, Indiana's quaint and popular myth, must be right when he says:

A President who can't save any money on a net salary of $50,000 per year, hasn't as much sense as an ordinary city councilman.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I ask to have incorporated here a statistical report, obtained at the cost of considerable research—a statement of salaries paid to various government officials and of startling increases, in recent years, of certain appropriations. I do this because, at this time when there is a great deal of comment throughout the country on the increase of government expenses, it is of importance that approximately correct facts be given out for public consideration. Therefore I submit the following schedule of expenditures, data as obtained from official sources:

STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES, COMPILED FEBRUARY 10, 1909.

There are no extra allowances to district judges except $10 a day for expenses when holding courts outside of their respective districts, and to circuit judges, when traveling, their actual traveling expenses.

NUMBER OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES AND AVERAGE SALARIES.

The last Official Register gives the total number of employees in the federal service in the District of Columbia, including the President, but not including Members of Congress or employees of Congress, as 28,947, and the aggregate compensation as $31,541,225, giving an average of $1,089.60.

Census Bulletin No. 94 gives the number of employees in the federal service in the District of Columbia in 1907 as 25,531 and their compensation in detail, as follows:

Less than $720	6,501
$720, but less than $840	2,236
$840, but less than $900	602
$900, but less than $1,000	1,516
$1,000, but less than $1,200	2,453
$1,200, but less than $1,400	4,537
$1,400, but less than $1,600	2,469
$1,600, but less than $1,800	1,361
$1,800, but less than $2,000	1,153
$2,000, but less than $2,500	841
$2,500 and over	617
By piecework	1,046

There is no appreciable increase in these salaries for the last ten years, or, in fact, for many years prior to that period, because the salaries of the clerks in the classified service have not been increased since they were first established by law many years ago. The only increases have been in the salaries of heads of departments, assistant secretaries, and some bureau officers, the aggregate of which will not materially increase the total and but very slightly the average.

The personnel of the navy, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Navy, is as follows:

Officers	2,133

Enlisted men (marines)	9,293

Look at the increase in the army appropriations in the ten years since the close of the Spanish-American war. Look at the increase of the navy appropriations since we have been at peace with all the world.

And, more than this, let us look at other growths of expense during the past few years. First, I refer to public statements of the able and distinguished head of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. TAWNEY] in a recent speech on the floor of this House. In his very able address in defense of his committee's action in recommending a reduction of the expense of the government detective bureau he said the appropriations act passed by the last Congress provides $1,105,000 to pay post-office detectives; $125,000 to pay internal-revenue detectives; $200,000 to pay customs-frauds detectives; $115,000 to pay counterfeiter detectives; $175,000 to pay bureau of corporations detectives; $450,000 to pay interstate-commerce detectives; $500,000 to pay public-lands detectives; $250,000 to pay antitrust-law detectives; $380,00 to pay pension-bureau detectives; $3,000,000 for meat-inspection detectives; and $826,000 for pure-food detectives. Of course he frankly urged that much of this is for necessary safeguard of public welfare, but the growth of this service has been out of all proportion to benefits to the public and to the ability of the people to pay. According to Mr. TAWNEY, the number of inspectors and detectives on the government pay roll just prior to the Spanish war was less than 200. To-day it exceeds 3,000, and the appropriations for their pay have jumped from a little over a million dollars to seven or eight times that amount.

But this is only one citation by the frank and courageous stalwart on the Republican side. He goes further, and announces the appalling condition in national finance to be that while we had a deficit in the National Treasury of $58,000,000 last year, we are to have a deficit of $117,000,000 this year, and will have $143,000,000 deficit next year.

Mr. Chairman, is it within the rules of propriety and established precedents to inquire why it is that when an effort is made to curtail some of these expenses, as was done by the Committee on Appropriations, the Members should be stigmatized by the highest acting authority in this country as designers against integrity in the public service?

Here is another instance: When the Committee on Military Affairs made its report an effort followed to add a half million dollars to the quarter of a million already provided for signal-service and air-ship experiments; and but for the tactful work of a few Members on each side of this House it would have passed, as was indicated by all proceedings up to the time of the roll call.

No patriotic man would question any reasonable "preparation for war in time of peace," but any and every fair-minded man will protest that large appropriations by the Government for experiments at air-ship inventing will discourage the genius of every man who does not happen to have a position on the government pay roll and who is ambitious to give the world an air ship on his own merits so he may reap the rewards of his own genius and his own financial risk as all other great inventors have had incentive to do.

We spend millions in a battle-ship cruise around the world to show other nations how awful we are, and in the name of economy frown upon requests for inland waterway improvements. We raise salaries and increase military appropriations with lavish hand, but we have no means to help the rural millions who need better highways and better transportation facilities, and who would be greatly benefited thereby. Ah, we do vastly more than this. By the Government's precepts of living beyond legitimate income we school thousands and thousands to lives of ruinous extravagance, and to other thousands, who feel justified in trying to ape government officials in high finance (with other people's money), we open the doors to prison doom.

I do not speak in scorn nor carping fanaticism. I do not speak in censure of all men of any party. Rather do I confess despair as I see members of both the great parties occasionally cast votes here that would embarrass them at home if their constituents but knew. Far be it from my purpose to attempt to point out to you, my colleagues of long experience and accomplishment in statecraft, what we shall do to relieve the millions of the increasing burden of expenses that are already weighing them down; but I do know what they expect of us, and that is to vote "no," and vote it so earnestly and emphatically that it shall redound to the glory and the consistency of an ideal republic and to the financial emancipation of mankind throughout all domain divinely blessed with the Stars and Stripes.

Will our constituents longer approve our votes because we affiliate with this political party or that? Will they excuse our carelessness of their well-being when we vote imposition upon them at the behest of some special interests or party leaders or party caucus? If they will not, and the signs of the times point unmistakably to such a new era in politics, then how will we of experience, of full responsibility, and of sovereign power—how will we justify ourselves on next election day? And how will our legislative delinquency affect the generations to come? These are questions that are up to us individually, for henceforth the people are going to elect their representatives on their individual merits as such, and may unselfish patriotism speed the day for such a wholesome triumph in American politics.

Mr. MARSHALL. I now yield forty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT].

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I suppose I voice the sentiments of most of the citizens of the United States who are interested in the welfare of this country in a feeling of deep regret at reading the recent addresses of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] on the subject of the Panama Canal.

As I read the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, it seemed to me he attacked the personal credit and honor and faith of the President of the United States, of the President-elect of the United States, and of President Obaldia of the Republic of Panama.

I know he did attack the faith and honor and credit of a distinguished citizen of my own home, Mr. William Nelson Cromwell, as he did the reputation of Mr. Charles P. Taft, of Mr. Harvey, and of Mr. Farnham; and it seemed to me that if there were facts that could justify such an attack all of us must take serious cognizance, not because we believe that they could be true, but because what had been published in the newspapers during the heat of a political campaign were given the faith, force, and credit of a statement from a Member of the great House of Representatives, who was protected from answering for his words, if they were false, by reason of his privilege on the floor of the House.

I therefore had many consultations with Mr. William Nelson Cromwell, because I knew that he probably knew more about the facts in the Panama Canal matter than any other one individual, and because I had faith in him, in his honor, and in his integrity.

I knew he was a man of high standing and reputation in his community; who had dealt in great matters and been connected with great affairs; and had, in so far as I had ever known—and I knew much about many of them—conducted them with a scrupulous integrity and honesty and a careful attention to details that justified people in giving him his great reputation. At my request Mr. Cromwell wrote me a letter, and at first I had expected to read it without comment; but the more I examined the papers that he suggested to me as proving the statements of his letter the more I felt that I myself wished to take the responsibility of making these statements and asserting to the House that it is an accurate and true statement of matters connected with Panama Canal affairs.

As I said a moment ago, during the troublous times before the national election, statements were rife that the Republican administration and all the people connected with it had been guilty of outrageous conduct in connection with the Panama Canal, and stories were offered to the press of New York in regard to this matter and were finally accepted by one of the newspapers in New York, which printed them broadcast, some of them possibly libelous. At that particular time and under the circumstances of the stress of excitement at the time of the national election it was impossible that legal steps could then be taken. From time to time statements were printed as to what would be done, and finally a specific statement was made in the New York World that immediately upon the opening of Congress a resolution would be offered by the Representative from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] for investigation of the matter. That resolution was introduced.

We have heard, as I say, two speeches following along that line. Those speeches contained a great number of inaccuracies and I shall try to show them here. I make that statement because I think everyone will be convinced then that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] must be in great part mistaken.

Mr. Cromwell, in an extended answer before Congress and in other statements made publicly, refuted these stories, and these statements should make everyone who is unprejudiced know that not a dollar of the $40,000,000 paid to the French companies or the $10,000,000 paid to the Panama Republic was ever received directly or indirectly by him, save a most moderate professional compensation, officially audited and approved and a matter of official record.

Mr. Cromwell never had a penny's interest in any business affair in the Republic of Panama, with the single exception of a comparatively small amount in the local light company, for which he paid cash at par at the earnest and particular solicitation of the people there.

One of the most serious things that was contained, it seems to me, in the address of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] was the personal attack upon the character of the President of the Panama Republic. Let me tell you the real facts in regard to the matter. Let me say that since these remarks were prepared, and since I have looked them over, I have to-day seen a gentleman of great importance in Panama, who made a statement that many Americans might think exaggerated, and that is that Mr. Obaldia to-day was entitled to be called the Washington of Panama. This gentleman followed that statement by saying that he was easily the most important and distinguished citizen in the Republic of Panama.

He is 64 years of age, and during that time he has constantly, except during his childhood, been in the public eye of his country and of Colombia. He is a gentleman of the highest accomplishments and refinement. He comes of a family which for generations have sat in the councils of their nation, and is universally recognized by his countrymen as a man of the highest type of personal honor and of political purity and patriotism. He is a rare type of gentleman and would be an honor to any country in the world, and is universally beloved and respected by his people. He is a sincere admirer of this Nation and its institutions.

It was his independence and patriotism which made him stand out alone as the only senator in the Colombian Congress who had the courage to vote in favor of the Hay-Herran treaty, as an open and courageous advocate of the interests of the Isthmus. It was he who thrice in public speeches in the Senate at Bogota, in the course of that debate, warned his fellow-countrymen that if the treaty was rejected the Department of Panama would revolt.

It was doubtless in recognition of his devotion to the Isthmus and his lofty character that he was selected as first Vice-President of the new Republic, and that justified the general expectation that he would be the natural successor to President Amador, whose advanced age precluded the possibility of his reelection. It was this gentleman who was made minister at Washington a few months after the independence of the Republic and whom all official life in Washington will remember for his charms of person and character. He was called home in May, 1907, to become Acting President during the six months' vacation of President Amador, but in general expectation of his succeeding to the presidency. In this expectation there was at that period no public difference, and President Amador himself openly stated it at that time as his individual preference for his friend of forty years' intimacy.

However, not long before the date fixed for the national election another distinguished citizen, holding the office of secretary of state, Mr. Arias, became a candidate, and questions arose as to the validity of the proceedings upon the approaching election. Sworn representations were made to Secretary Taft by various committees of both political parties indicating that if the validity of the election should be brought in question public disorder would follow, endangering the property of the canal and the interests of the United States, as well as the peace of the Republic. This was the reason for the necessary consideration of the subject by Secretary Taft.

As a result of friendly conferences between the highest officials of both governments, a happy solution was found in the proposal by the Panama Government to itself establish a commission of electoral inquiry and to invite the United States to have representatives, without any judicial functions, accompany that commission in its investigations. By this means the crisis was averted and the national election proceeded in an orderly manner. Mr. Arias, for reasons of his own, withdrew his candidacy on the eve of the election, and Mr. Obaldia was elected.

Protocols for treaties between the United States, Panama, and Colombia had been signed at Washington in August, 1907, but in preparing the treaties certain questions arose requiring examination on the Isthmus relating to boundary, and so forth. In May, 1908, Secretary Taft was going to the Isthmus upon canal matters and his visit was availed of to arrange for conference upon certain treaty subjects. Accordingly, Minister Arango, then at Washington, and Mr. Cromwell, as counsel for Panama, proceeded to the Isthmus in advance of Secretary Taft, and when he arrived conferences were held between him and the American minister on the one part and the officials of the Republic of Panama and Mr. Cromwell on the other concerning certain treaty subjects. It was while there on this treaty mission, and without any anticipation in advance, that the question of the national election arose and was happily solved, as I have stated.

It is apparent, therefore, that President Obaldia was not forced upon the people of Panama by this Government or by any other agency, and that he was the free choice of his countrymen; that the action of Secretary Taft was statesmanlike, prudent, friendly, and greatly beneficial to both countries, and any statement to the contrary, by whomsoever made, on or off the floor of the House, is entirely unwarranted.

The gentleman from Illinois stated that President Obaldia and Mr. Cromwell have been closely identified with each other for ten years past.

Mr. Chairman, this is another mistake. Mr. Cromwell informs me that he never had met or had communication with Mr. Obaldia until the latter came here as minister to Washington in June, 1904.

The gentleman from Illinois made statements relative to propositions being entertained by the Republic of Panama for the construction of a railroad within that territory and the sale of timber from public lands. In this connection I should say that I now assert that this same William Nelson Cromwell has no interest in them whatever. I want further to state that these subjects, as all of us know, are exclusive within the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama, and I do not imagine that any action of this Congress would be pertinent. I do think that it would be decidedly out of place. The consideration by our Congress of any such questions local to Panama is not justified by any principle of international law or any rule of international courtesy or ethics.

I now want to read a cablegram that was sent by Mr. Cromwell to Mr. Obaldia:

NEW YORK, January 29, 1909.

President OBALDIA, Presidencia, Panama:

In view of statements made in Congress by Representative RAINEY, of Illinois, respecting railroad and timber propositions recently under consideration by the Panama Government and legislature, I beg leave to state that I am not and never have been, in any manner, directly or indirectly, presently or prospectively, interested in either of the proposed affairs, or any other railroad or timber proposition whatsoever, in the Republic of Panama.

Please do me the favor to give this statement the fullest publicity.

WM. NELSON CROMWELL.

It was published in Panama.

In a speech on the 26th day of January the gentleman from Illinois made this statement:

On Sunday night, the 27th day of December, Obaldia called to his palace certain members of the general assembly, and they then and at that time demanded of him to know who the men were back of John Ehrman, representing that John Ehrman had no particular financial standing; and at that time they were told that the men who were back of this infamous, outrageous scheme were William Nelson Cromwell, Roger L. Farnham, his confidential clerk, W. S. Harvey, and Charles P. Taft.

The gentleman from Illinois laid especial and particular point in regard to that statement as showing the conspiracy that had been entered into by these gentlemen in both public and private life. This conference was participated in (the conference to which the gentleman from Illinois referred in his speech) by the President, his cabinet, and 17 members of the Assembly. Mr. Cromwell has handed to me original cablegrams from every one of the members of the council, and also one from Mr. Ehrman, which shows that Mr. Ehrman was not present at all at that conference—and I have the originals in my pocket—that no American or other outsider was present at said conference, and no mention was ever made by the President or any other person of the names of Mr. Cromwell and the other gentlemen mentioned.

Mr. Ehrman himself specifically declares that not only did he not make that statement quoted by the gentleman from Illinois, but, in fact, that Mr. Cromwell and the others named were not connected with the parties interested with him in the affairs, and the cables are as follows:

PANAMA, January 31, 1909.

MANUEL OBALDIA,
Hotel Latham, New York:

I was not present at conference at presidencia December 27. Therefore have never made statement to Diputados relating to parties interested in timber proposition, who have no connection with Charles Taft, Cromwell, or Farnham, so I have never mentioned them to anybody.

(JOHN) JUAN EHRMAN.

I will say in this connection that Manuel Obaldia is the son of the President of Panama, and he was in New York at the time and is consul-general of Panama at New York.

JANUARY 31, 1909.

MANUEL OBALDIA,
Hotel Latham, New York.

My attitude while in Colombian Congress in 1903 and my entire public life are far beyond the reach of slanderers.

Amador Arias's government was not overthrown; but, after expiration of constitutional term, was defeated in free elections, which freedom of suffrage was due to the presence of the Americans at polls specially invited to do so by Amador Arias's government, as it is shown by official communication published, and in accordance with article 136 of Panamanian constitution.

At conference at presidencia December 27 were present the members of the cabinet and 17 Diputados. Neither Ehrman or any other outsider was present, and no mention was ever made by me or by any other person of Charles Taft, Cromwell, or Farnham in regard to timber proposition which was brought before them for consideration. Railway proposition presented by Ward to Assembly was considered and rejected. Assembly passed a law authorizing to construct railroads with public funds, said roads to be national property.

Timber contract with Ehrman was rejected by Assembly, and there is a bill under consideration regulating forest exploitation on the Atlantic coast between Rive Concepcion and Costa Rica, including the entire Chagres Valley.

(President) OBALDIA.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the writer of that telegram use the word "slanderers" there?

Mr. OLCOTT. No; I think he does not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thought I caught that in the reading.

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes; he does. He says that his public life is far beyond the reach of slanderers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. To whom does he allude there?

Mr. OLCOTT. I have not the slightest idea. I think that is a general statement, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think I have an idea to whom he alludes. Does not the gentleman think the best way out of this controversy is to have a full hearing; have Mr. Cromwell and Obaldia and the whole crowd——

Mr. OLCOTT. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to go on with my remarks.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And pass a resolution——

Mr. OLCOTT. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, that is no speech; I was just asking for the fair thing.

Mr. OLCOTT. I have another cable here which I would like to read.

PANAMA, February 1, 1909.

MANUEL OBALDIA,
Hotel Latham.

We, the undersigned, Diputados to the National Assembly of Panama, declare that we were present at the conference that took place at the Presidencia on the 27th of December last, and affirm that in said conference neither President Obaldia nor anybody else stated that Messrs. Taft, Cromwell, or Farnham had any interest or participation in the timber affair proposed to the Government of the Republic.

GONZALO SANTOS K.	IGNACIO QUINZADA.

I want to call particular attention to the fact that the President's dispatch not only disposes of the gentlemen in regard to the railway and timber propositions, but shows that the proposition made by Mr. Ward, which was referred to in the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, had been rejected by Congress, and that Congress itself passed a law for the construction of the railroad, which would be national property, and the same is true in regard to Mr. Ehrman's timber matter.

Now, great stress was laid in regard to the financial integrity of the Panama Government, and in that connection attention must be called to the one hundred and thirty-eighth article of the constitution of Panama, which is as follows:

In order to guarantee to posterity a part of the pecuniary benefits derived from the negotiation for the opening of the interoceanic canal, the sum of $6,000,000 is to be reserved, which will be inverted into securities producing a fixed annual revenue. The law will regulate this inversion.

Mr. Cromwell presented to the Senate committee in February, 1906, a detailed memorandum showing the investment and disposition of the entire $10,000,000 paid by the United States to the Republic of Panama. The investment of $6,000,000 in first mortgages upon high-class improved property in the city of New York remains intact.

I will say in this connection that once in a matter entirely apart from any relation I had with Mr. Cromwell I had occasion to look over this list of securities, because they were deposited in a trust company, and I also want to say I have had some experience in connection with real estate in New York, and I have never seen a finer line of securities than constitutes that particular $6,000,000 fund.

All these funds are cared for and safeguarded in the most scrupulous manner, and there is now thus invested and on deposit in the trust companies in New York City, at interest, the aggregate sum of $7,249,014.23, in addition to its cash in Panama. Every dollar of this stands in the name of the Republic of Panama. No disbursements are made from these funds without the direct order of the Government of Panama. The accounting between New York and the Republic of Panama is systematic and perfect, and the disbursement of every dollar of these funds is published at regular and frequent intervals by the minister of finance of the Government of Panama in the Official Gazette, and is thus made known to all the citizens of that country.

The management of the Panama Government is prudent and the national funds are zealously guarded. It is proud of the position which it occupies, it being, perhaps, the only civilized country which has not a dollar of debt and which has a substantial cash reserve. It has also placed itself upon a gold basis by voluntarily creating a cash fund now on deposit with the trust companies of the city of New York, in the name of the Republic, representing the difference in value between the silver currency and the gold coin. No people could manifest more clearly their high standard of financial honor and their worthy ambition to be ranked among the best of the world. The young Republic is worthy the respect, confidence, and praise of their American brethren, and improper insinuations against its conduct on the floor of the House are not only improper as a matter of international courtesy, but grossly false in fact.

The pending treaties between Panama, Colombia, and the United States have been referred to as furthering in some mysterious way an improper purpose. Permit me to say that after the independence four fundamental questions remained for adjustment between Panama and Colombia, as is usual in cases of separation of territory, as was the case between United States and Great Britain, between Colombia and other South American republics separated from Spain, and many other well-known instances.

These involved the establishment of the precise boundary between Panama and Colombia; the ascertainment of the proportion of the foreign debt of Colombia which should be borne by the separating republic, and the adjustment of other pecuniary relations; commercial, extradition, postal arbitration, and other relations, as well as the formal recognition by Colombia itself of the independence of Panama, as had been done by all other civilized nations. The United States was, of course, deeply concerned in promoting these ends, and by request of Colombia and Panama loaned its good offices as mediator. These negotiations were, with much vicissitude, pursued for over two years, when, on August 17, 1907, protocols for treaties were formally signed at Washington; but fresh differences arose in the preparation of the treaties themselves, and it was only on the 9th day of January, 1909, complete accord was reached and the treaties were signed.

This happy result is one of portentous significance in United States and South American affairs. It reestablishes cordial diplomatic and commercial relations; it determines vexatious questions of boundary lines and pecuniary obligations; and furnishes to all South America a practical illustration of the fraternal attitude and friendly disposition of the United States.

When the Hay-Herran treaty was pending before the Colombian Congress in 1903, and when that Government demanded of Mr. Cromwell's French clients the equivalent of $20,000,000 in cash as the price of its consent to the sale of the company's property to the United States, it was his duty to oppose that demand, and he did so; but since the independence there can be no doubt that he has been earnestly devoted to the establishment between Panama and Colombia of the relations embodied in these treaties.

It is this beneficent result which constitutes to the mind of the Member from Illinois an inscrutible and unfathomable depth of mystery and mischief.

Although the purchase of the Panama Canal properties was fully and satisfactorily concluded in May, 1904, and although every step has been reported to Congress, the heat of party conflict in the recent national campaign induced the publication of the stories to which reference has already been made concerning the purchase of the canal. Mr. Cromwell made this the subject of an explicit public statement on December 11, 1908, which was transmitted by the President to Congress in connection with his message on December 15, 1908, and I will ask that a copy of such statement be printed at the end of my remarks.

There is no obscurity or uncertainty about any aspect of the canal purchase.

The indubitable records exist and are open to all who are entitled to see them.

Prior to 1899 the people of the United States had not given the Panama Canal serious consideration, although work upon it was steadily progressing by the French company, with several thousand laborers. But in March of that year Congress created a new commission (the Walker Commission), and then, for the first time, an examination was made of the Panama route and the concessions, work, plant, and other affairs of the Panama Canal and Railroad.

This examination was made during six weeks' daily sessions in Paris by the commission as a body, and subsequently by many months' examination on the Isthmus with a corps of engineers.

I can state, without fear of contradiction, that the members of the commission were greatly surprised and most favorably impressed with the result of their investigations and the superiority of the Panama route over that of Nicaragua, which had theretofore been popularly considered the preferable one. No unprejudiced person can read the commission's reports and the subsequent testimony of its members before the committees of the Senate and House without being satisfied that the commission were of this opinion. But the law under which they acted required them to recommend the route "most practicable and feasible," and which could be "under the control, management, and ownership of the United States."

This included, therefore, not only technical superiority and feasibility, but also the practicability of the United States controlling, managing, and owning the same. In other words, that while the Panama route might be the superior and feasible route from a technical standpoint, it would not be a practicable one for the purposes of the United States, if it could not be acquired upon satisfactory terms and placed under the "control, management, and ownership of the United States;" and that, therefore, the two elements, feasibility and practicability, must coexist.

For this reason, as their reports state, the commission requested the Panama Canal Company, in September, 1899, to state the price and terms upon which it would sell the canal properties in case the United States should adopt the Panama route.

The French company, while furnishing every facility in France and upon the Isthmus for the most minute inspection of its plans and work, was reluctant to sell upon any terms or to abandon the completion of the canal as a French enterprise. The correspondence reported to Congress by the commission shows a series of letters upon the part of the commission addressed to the Panama Canal Company, urging a reply to the request that the company declare whether it was willing at all to sell, and if so, the price at which it would sell. For more than a year and a half the company steadily refrained from making any definite reply to this request.

The company sent to this country its president, who thereafter personally conducted the conferences with the commission and furnished appraisements and valuations of $109,000,000 as a basis for discussion. Finally, in November, 1901, the commission announcing that it was unable to procure a definite offer from the French company, closed the debate by remaking a report (November 16, 1901) in favor of the Nicaragua route, upon the ground that it was not "practicable" to acquire from the French company the Panama Canal and bring it under the "control, management, and ownership of the United States," and they set forth the voluminous correspondence with the president of the company describing their efforts in that regard.

Upon page 103 of their report the commission fixed the sum of $40,000,000 as to the value to the United States of the Panama company's properties (including about 98 per cent of the railroad shares) as it then stood, giving the items thereof in detail, but taking no account of the valuable concessions owned by the company and which cost the company altogether over $3,000,000, nor the vast amount of locomotives, cars, tools, machinery, supplies, dredges, and other plant, which cost many millions of dollars, and considerable of which has since been utilized by the United States.

The gentleman from Illinois says that when the Colombia Congress was demanding from the canal company some portion of the $40,000,000 the franchise granted to the canal company expired in less than a year, and at that time the entire French holdings on the Isthmus would be forfeited to Colombia. The facts are that the canal franchises had at that time (October, 1903) still seven years to run (October 31, 1910) and the railroad concessions had sixty-six years to run (1969).

In view of the commission's report recommending the Nicaragua route and the state of the legislation in Congress, the Panama company cabled to the commission on January 4, 1902 (confirmed January 9, 1902), as follows:

* * * The company declares itself ready to transfer to the Government of the United States on payment of $40,000,000 its properties and concessions estimated at that amount by the Isthmian Canal Commission in its last report, page 103, in conformity with the terms and conditions of said report.

The reference to page 103 of the commission's report was the valuation of $40,000,000 made by the commission. Upon demand of the United States, the company, by cable of January 11, 1902, also included in the sale "all maps and archives in Paris." It is manifest, therefore, first, that the French company was reluctant to surrender the completion by itself of the canal enterprise and had resisted for over a year and a half the efforts of the commission to procure an offer of sale; second, that it finally made the sale under pressure of the circumstances referred to; third, that the price was fixed not by the French company, but by the Government of the United States in the commission's report referred to.

The price was fixed by the United States itself, and the property delivered to the United States included millions of dollars of property in addition to that valued in the appraisal made by the United States. As, at last, an offer had been procured by them from the French company, the commission promptly reconvened and by their further report of January 19, 1902, recommended the acceptance of the offer, and subsequently Congress, after exhaustive debate, adopted the so-called "Spooner bill" on June 28, 1902, authorizing the consummation of the purchase under conditions of an approved title and a satisfactory treaty with the sovereign of the territory.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of fact, the Government of the United States received as part value for the $40,000,000 paid 36,000,000 cubic yards of excavation made by the French; which, at what it cost us, $1.10 per cubic yard, would amount to $39,600,000, and if we received nothing but that we received full value for the amount we paid.

Mr. OLCOTT. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois perfectly, although I can not calculate figures as quickly as he can. The point I tried to make at that particular moment was that really the United States Government fixed the price we paid for this canal.

Mr. MADDEN. And we got value for the price.

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes; and I know from my own visual observation of it when I was on the Panama Zone myself that the amount of material and engines and a vast amount of things that went to make up the purchases by the French Government, very much of that material, was in actual use when I was on the Isthmus two years ago.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. And good buildings.

Mr. OLCOTT. And a good many good buildings.

The transaction was concluded and the sale consummated May 10, 1904, and payment made to the liquidators of the two French companies directly from the Treasury of the United States into the Bank of France, through Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co., as fiscal agents of the United States. The expense of the transmission of the fund from the United States to France was borne by the French company. Messrs. Morgan & Co. received compensation, measured by the difference in exchange, of about $35,000 only, in respect of the $40,000,000 gold transmitted. No part of this expense was borne by the United States.

The receipts of the liquidators of the old company and of the Panama Canal Company for the entire sum of $40,000,000 are on file in the Treasury of the United States, and show, as any citizen can see, that the $40,000,000 was paid directly into the Bank of France to the credit of the liquidators of the old and the new French companies, in the proportions approved by the French tribunal.

In Mr. Cromwell's public statement of December 11, 1908, he explained how this sum of $40,000,000 was distributed by the liquidators to the beneficiaries of each company; that there was no American syndicate which had previously acquired the canal and then sold it to the United States; and that the whole story to that effect was a falsehood and concoction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman one question, but I do not want to interrupt the gentleman making his speech.

Mr. OLCOTT. I will either ask leave to continue my remarks in the RECORD, or I can finish in about fifteen minutes, if I can have that time.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BRODHEAD. May I ask the question now, or shall I wait.

Mr. OLCOTT. Just as the gentleman prefers.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I understood the gentleman to say that this $6,000,000 paid the Republic of Panama was invested by that Republic in real estate in the city of New York.

Mr. OLCOTT. I said in mortgages on real estate.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Are the mortgages made directly to the Republic of Panama? What is in my mind is, how can a foreign government hold real estate, directly or indirectly, in this country, and when mortgages are made directly to the Republic of Panama, in the event of a foreclosure it is possible it might——

Mr. OLCOTT. I would like to say in regard to the question the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked me, that there is no law in the State of New York that prohibits foreign corporations from investing money in mortgages on real estate. There is a law in the State of New York providing that if they have to foreclose any mortgage, they must dispose of them within a fixed time.

Mr. BRODHEAD. These mortgages to which the gentleman refers are made directly to the Republic of Panama without the intervention of a trustee——

Mr. OLCOTT. I see the gentleman's point perfectly. I think the fact is they are directly and absolutely under the order and direction of the Republic of Panama. Just at this moment I can not remember exactly what the title of the mortgagee is, but I shall be very glad to get the information. During this period and before closing the purchase the company communicated to the United States its expectation that reimbursement for such additional actual cash outlay would be made as part of the purchase and as a part of the concluding details of the transfer. The subject of this additional construction work was accordingly—and as a part of the closing of title by written agreement—referred to President Roosevelt, as sole arbitrator, with the understanding that his decision should be conclusive.

Through the Attorney-General the duty of examining into and reporting upon the facts was delegated to the commission, reserving to the Attorney-General the questions of law. The commission performed its duty and reported that the amount had, in fact, been actually so expended. Subsequently, as sole arbitrator, the President rendered a decision to the effect that he considered that the purchase price of $40,000,000 should embrace the additional expenditures; so that between the time they started to negotiate and four years afterwards, when the negotiations had been consummated, there were over two million and a quarter of dollars expended.

There was at no time any question as to the fact of the expenditures and as to the amount thereof, nor as to the fact that the United States received the benefit of it. It is manifest, therefore, that the presentation of this claim by the French company was warranted by the conditions and was a part of the transaction, while conclusively adversely disposed of by the decision of the agreed abitrator.

Thus the United States received this additional work, costing the French company $2,251,808.47, as a part of the $40,000,000 purchase. To characterize this account for further construction work as fraudulent is, therefore, a manifest wrong to the French company and only aggravates their sense of loss.

During the pendency of the offer, also, the Panama Railroad Company continued in operation under control of the French company, and under the circumstances of the case it was legally entitled to the net earnings of operation. This right was unquestioned. The management of the railroad company was officially passed upon in behalf of the Government by a subcommittee of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House, appointed under resolution approved by the House January 12, 1905, and which, after investigation at New York and in Washington of the affairs, earnings, and condition of the Panama Railroad Company, rendered its unanimous report to the House, which, among other things, stated:

> The testimony shows that the management by the officers and directors of the Panama Railroad has been conspicuously able, progressive, and businesslike.

Further, an exhaustive report by the Secretary of War to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate on the 28th of June, 1906, especially dealt with and disposed of the subject of dividends. In that report, presenting exhaustive analyses of accounts, he stated:

> The figures show, therefore, that instead of the Panama Canal Company, as a stockholder in the railroad company, depriving the United States, as its transferee of stock, of the benefit to it of assets of the company by the declaration and payment of dividends in excess of net earnings, there was left in the treasury of the company $109,344.56 of undivided profits.

Not only were the French companies entitled to the net earnings for the reasons stated, but by other considerations as well. In the first place, no interest was allowed to them upon the purchase price of $40,000,000 between the date of offer (January, 1902) and the transfer to the United States (May, 1904), which, at the rate of 4 per cent, would have amounted to over $3,200,000, as against dividends of less than $1,000,000; and second, they expended (as it turned out) $2,251,808.47, several hundred thousand dollars of which were actually expended between January, 1902, and May, 1904, and for which, through the decision of the President, it received no additional allowance.

Every account and transaction of the railroad company was audited and approved by the government officials after full examination.

This brings me to state a consideration of great moment to this country, and that is that both the Panama Canal and the Panama Railroad were turned over to the United States well equipped, well managed, in active operation, and with a sympathetic and energetic force that enabled the great work to go on through both branches of that service without interruption from the moment of the transfer. This fact in the construction of the canal will be appreciated as an element of tremendous advantage in the prosecution of the undertaking, and has been an important factor in enabling the United States to reach the advanced stage of construction which its energetic officials have attained.

Permit me now to make allusion to the brief continuance of Mr. Cromwell and some of his associates in the board of the Panama Railroad Company after the consummation of the purchase. Pursuant to the authority of Congress, the responsibility of this great affair was placed in the hands of the Secretary of War, acting more directly through the Isthmian Canal Commission. The affair was so vast and the experience which had been acquired by the officials and counsel through their many years' previous association with it was deemed so valuable that they were asked to continue for a while in their respective relations and give the Government the benefit thereof. Pursuant to this expressed wish, Mr. Cromwell, with others of the old board, continued as director and his firm as counsel of the railroad company until April 1, 1907, when Mr. Cromwell terminated every relation with the company.

Naturally, with these negotiations, the consummation of which meant so much to their different companies, it was imperative that for the time being the United States Government should have representatives with each particular company, and therefore for a considerable length of time Mr. Willam Nelson Cromwell was a director of the Panama Railway Company, as was Mr. Farnham. At the moment it was feasible for them to do so they resigned as directors, and Mr. Cromwell's connection there as director or counsel of the Panama Railroad Company actually and absolutely ceased on the 1st of April, 1907.

The Panama Government had invested $1,000,000 in the first mortgage bonds of the Panama Railroad Company, and in recognition of the fact that it was the largest single owner of its bonds, and in token of friendliness to that nation, Mr. Obaldia, then minister at Washington, was invited by this Government to a seat in the board. Nevertheless, he, with Mr. Farnham, retired from the board when Mr. Cromwell did, on April 1, 1907.

Therefore the statement by the gentleman from Illinois that Mr. Cromwell, Mr. Obaldia, and Mr. Farnham are members of the Panama Railroad Company, or that either of them has since April 1, 1907, had any official or professional relations to the company, is a mistake, as the records of the company and of the Government will instantly reveal.

The speech referred to is so full of erroneous statements that it is difficult to follow them all, but among them will be noted the statement that while Mr. Cromwell was counsel for the Panama Railroad Company he acted as counsel for the Transcontinental Railroad, under Mr. Harriman's control. This also is erroneous.

I have thus disposed of every material criticism or statement made on the floor of the House concerning the acquisition by the Government of the United States of the canal and railroad properties.

I would not have felt justified in dealing with these matters at such length and with so much particularity were it not for the fact that a Member of the House of Representatives has chosen to avail of his privilege as a Member of that distinguished body to make the unwarrantable and false statements to which I have referred. By reason of his position the statements thus made by him have received a currency and a publicity which otherwise would have been impossible. They have appeared in the records of Congress, have been circulated through the press throughout the country, and although in many material respects categorically denied and disproved, have, in effect, been reiterated by him on the floor of the House. Protected as he is by his constitutional privilege, there is no means within the power of Mr. Cromwell legally to call him to an account for the wrong which he has perpetrated. Had the statements been made in good faith or been founded upon facts he might plead this in extenuation of the wrong committed by him. But it appears from what I have said, from the records of Congress, from the history of the case, and from the indisputable facts, that not a single statement of fact made by him was either in spirit or letter justified or in any respect consistent with truth.

No course is left Mr. Cromwell, as a self-respecting citizen, but to brand such statements as entirely erroneous, unwarranted, and unfounded, and this I accede to as a matter of justice to the President of Panama and to those who have so ably and conscientiously cooperated in bringing about and consummating this affair, and as a matter of justice to Mr. Cromwell in the great undertaking in which he has performed so important a part.

Having devoted many years of his life to the achieving of this the greatest work of mankind, and having done so without a penny of gain or profit of any kind from any source beyond strictly professional compensation, and having since the acquisition by the United States served his country upon many occasions at the request of the Executives, without the thought of reward, prizing more than all else their official thanks in behalf of the Government, he feels that he is entitled to the protection of the House of Representatives against misrepresentation.

Mr. Chairman, in closing I would like to say that during the considerable investigation that I have made of the facts concerning Mr. Cromwell's connection while with this company since the first speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] was made, I have felt confident that every one, if they would go to the documents and look at the data, as I have, will believe that this negotiation whereby our Government purchased the canal, took over the stock of the Panama Railroad Company, and acquired all the working plant that the French Canal Company had, has not only been carried on with honesty, and not only has everything been open and above board, but that there has been a careful attention to detail that is scarcely ever found in a work of such magnificence and magnitude.

I believe further, Mr. Chairman, that among the great glories of the administration soon to be closed will be the inception of the Panama Canal for this Government, and I believe that one of the greatest stories that will be told of the President-elect will be of his connection with it when he was Secretary of War, and what I believe will be his connection with it when that great Panama Canal is opened. [Applause.]

I would like permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Statement of William Nelson Cromwell, published December 11, 1909, and communicated to Congress with the President's message December 15, 1909.]

MR. CROMWELL'S STATEMENT.

My attention has been called to a statement issued by the editor of the Indianapolis News in which he attempts to reply to the charge made by President Roosevelt that certain statements made in the Indianapolis News, both before and since the recent election, and relating to the purchase of the Panama Canal by the United States were false and untrue.

The President said:

"The News gives currency to the charge that 'the United States bought from American citizens for $40,000,000 property that cost these citizens only $12,000,000.' The statement is false. The United States did not pay a cent of the $40,000,000 to any American citizen, etc."

From the statement issued in reply by the editor of the News I quote the following:

"The only man who paid any attention to them—that is, the criticisms referred to, etc.—was Mr. Charles P. Taft, who did deny that he was in any way related to the affair. We had no word from the President or Mr. Taft. The other men, such as Cromwell and Morgan, who were believed to have full information in regard to the business, said nothing."

And he attempts to justify the publication of the false statements appearing in his paper by saying that they "were based largely on statements of the New York World, criticisms which were made over and over again during the campaign, and were utterly ignored until to-day."

MR. CROMWELL'S DENIAL.

The reply to the editor of the News furnishes another proof of the justice of the President's characterizations, for in the very journal under whose sheets it now takes refuge, namely, in the New York World of October 3, 1908, appears an explicit and unqualified denial by me of the story referred to, and in which I used the following language:

"We may expect during a heated political contest all kinds of stories, which are not worthy of notice; but this one I wish to denounce in the strongest terms as a lying fabrication, without a shadow of truth in it. Neither I nor anyone allied with me, either directly or indirectly, at any time or in any place, in America or abroad, every bought, sold, dealt in, or ever made a penny of profit out of any stocks, bonds, or other securities of either the old Panama Canal Company or the New Panama Canal Company, or ever received for the same a single dollar of the forty millions paid by the United States. I make this the most sweeping statement that language can convey.

"As everybody connected with the affair knows, I abstained from receiving the forty millions in my own hands at Washington or New York as the general counsel of the company, and myself arranged for the payment of the entire forty millions direct from the Treasury of the United States, through the bankers of the Government, into the Bank of France at Paris to the credit of the liquidators of the two companies. There it remained, subject to the order of the liquidators, until distributed by them to the hundreds of thousands of beneficiaries, and not one dollar of it ever came to me or to anyone in any wise connected with me. Of course, I do not refer to our regular compensation as counsel."

I wish to call attention to the fact that upon the first day of the hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate of the United States, in February, 1906, I voluntarily made an explicit and detailed statement showing how the $40,000,000 was paid by the United States, through Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co., as their agents, to the Bank of France, at Paris, for account of the New Panama Canal Company, and also explaining the subsequent payment of the full amount to the liquidators of the New Panama Canal Company and to the liquidator of the old Panama Canal Company, who in turn distributed the same to their respective stock and bond holders, numbering hundreds of thousands of persons.

I further submitted to the Senate committee, with the permission of the Panama Government, a detailed statement of the disposition by the Republic of Panama of the $10,000,000 paid by the United States to Panama in 1904, accounting for the payment of the whole amount, and showing the investments and disposition by the Panama Government of every dollar.

Upon the same public inquiry I further stated with reference to the proposed Americanization of the Panama Canal Company in the year 1899 and the proposed formation of a syndicate for that purpose in that year, that the proposed plan never matured into anything. It was never consummated either by subscription or by assent, and it is obsolete and an impracticable thing—proved so to be. It has no life or force of being, did not exist, and never has existed, and is as dead as a door nail.

That was a fruitless suggestion of the company, which came to naught, and under which I acted as their counsel solely.

TESTIMONY A PUBLIC RECORD.

The testimony taken by the Senate committee is a public record and was available to the editors of the News and the World, and had either of them been as interested in publishing the truth as they were to create a political sensation, they doubtless would have taken the pains to have published the above facts, which I quote.

I again denounce the statement wherever published or by whomsoever made that there was a syndicate formed by American citizens to purchase the Panama Canal and to sell it to the United States as absolutely and unqualifiedly false and untrue. The Americanization plan was an entirely different matter. It was a project proposed by the company to the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House and to President McKinley on February 27, 1899, and was formally authorized by the board of directors October 10, 1899, subject to the necessary approval of stockholders.

The initial steps were taken by me in October, November, and December, 1899, and a company formed for the purpose under the laws of New Jersey for carrying out the instructions of my client. While the certificate of incorporation of the Panama Canal Company of America was filed in New Jersey, no capital stock, except the nominal capital of $5,000 set forth in the certificate of incorporation was ever issued, and nothing further was ever done by that company, as the records in the office of the secretary of state of New Jersey will show.

The project adopted by the board of directors failed of approval by the stockholders in December, 1899; the board of directors in consequence resigned in a body, and the plan then and there forever ended. The period covered by this project was less than three months; not a dollar was paid in under it nor a transaction conducted by the New Jersey company for the reason stated. The plan was dead and abandoned over two years before the company finally yielded to the pressure of the American Government to sell at $40,000,000.

DISPOSITION OF THE $40,000,000.

Now, with regard to the distribution of the $40,000,000, it has been made to appear in newspaper comments that there was some mystery connected with the disposition of this money. There is no mystery and never has been. The fund in question paid into the Bank of France by the United States produced the net sum of 206,000,000 francs, the sum of 128,000,000 francs being placed to the credit of the liquidator of the old Panama Canal Company and 77,400,000 francs being placed to the credit of the New Panama Canal Company in liquidation, and by said bank paid over to said liquidators, respectively, pursuant to a decision of arbitration at Paris February 11, 1902, confirmed by the civil tribunal of the Seine.

To the Senate committee I stated that I did not know what distribution of the fund had been made, and that I was in no way concerned or interested therein. That statement by me was true. I had no pecuniary interest in the canal, and it was none of my business, personally or professionally, who were the stockholders or bondholders of the company.

Since the recent publications I have made inquiries in Paris and am informed that the distribution of these moneys is a matter of public records; that the amount received by the liquidator of the old Panama Canal Company has been distributed by him as an officer of the court to the holders of the obligations of the old company; that these persons appeared in person at the office of the liquidator to receipt for the moneys paid to them; that they numbered 226,296, the largest number of individuals probably ever appearing in person upon a single business affair, and that the average amount paid was $156.

The complete and detailed record of these payments, together with the name and receipt of every person to whom payment was made and the amount of such payment, is in the hands of the liquidator at his offices, at 50 Rue Etienne Marcel, Paris, which is in a prominent and frequented part of the city, near the Bourse, easily found by any one desirous of doing so.

As to the fund paid to the New Panama Canal Company, that company, at the time of the sale of its property to the United States, went into liquidation, and I am likewise recently informed that the distribution of its assets among its shareholders was made through four leading banks of Paris—the Crédit Lyonnais Société Générale, Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris, and Crédit Industriel et Commerciel—in three separate payments—July 15, 1904; February 8, 1908; and June 15, 1908—covering a period of four years, and was completed in June, 1908. This liquidation took place at the regular offices of the company, 19 Rue Louis le Grand, Paris, readily found by anybody who honestly sought to find them.

The facts concerning the liquidation are a matter of public report to the shareholders of the company (this company had no bond issues) and were the subject of official publications from time to time covering a period of four years in the official papers under direction of the courts. The amount so paid to the shareholders of the New Panama Canal Company, as I am informed by the liquidators, is approximately 129.78 francs on each share of the par value of 100 francs; that is, they merely received back only the capital originally invested, with interest less than 3 per cent per annum. I am informed by the liquidators that the shareholders to whom distribution was made numbered 6,796.

NEVER OWNED A SHARE OF STOCK.

Neither I nor my law firm nor anyone connected with me ever owned, directly or indirectly, any share of stock in the New Panama Canal Company nor any of the obligations or securities of the old Panama Canal Company, nor ever bought or sold any of the shares or securities of either one of said companies, nor were directly or indirectly interested in them.

I am also positive that not a man in public life in America, in or out of Congress, ever had the least pecuniary interest in the Panama Canal.

I do not know and never have known of any American citizen who has ever dealt in any of the shares of the New Panama Canal Company or the shares or bonds of the old company.

A further instance of the unwarranted attitude of the Indianapolis News and of other journals repeating the statements is furnished with respect to Mr. C. P. Taft and Mr. Douglas Robinson. In the same issue of the World, October 3, 1908, I said:

"The mention of the names of Mr. Taft and Mr. Douglas Robinson is another evidence that this is a fake story. No member of the Taft family or Mr. Douglas Robinson ever had the remotest connection with Panama Canal matters, directly or indirectly, and I never saw one of them on this subject before the United States acquired the canal. I never saw Mr. Douglas Robinson in my life. The names of Cæsar and Napoleon might as well have been used, for it could not be more impossible. All this, except the dragging in of new names, was thrashed out before the United States Senate committee by the late Senator Morgan.

"Out of respect for the dead, I refrain from comment upon that proceeding, but I feel warranted in saying that it was pursued with unparalleled energy and skill. It was, however, completely exploded and refuted by the facts in the case, and ended in complete discomfiture. There is not a word of truth in it, and I would not notice it at this time if it did not concern others."

LIKE CHARACTERS IN FICTION.

The introduction of these gentlemen in the Panama affairs is like the creation of a character in a work of fiction. They did not exist in the sense of having any relation to the canal matter. Neither of them ever had the least pecuniary interest in the business. It is a matter of public history that the President-elect never had any official connection with the canal until months after it had been acquired by this Government. He was in the Philippines as governor during all the years in question.

Equally perverted is the fact concerning the records and accounts of the two companies. They were not delivered to the United States, because they were records of the companies' transactions with which the United States had no concern. But, as a matter of fact, the records and files of the liquidation of the old company are in the hands of the liquidator at 50 Rue Etienne Marcel, Paris, and those of the new company were, on the final payment in June, 1908, deposited with the Credit Lyonnais, Boulevard des Italiens, to be preserved, in accordance with French custom, for a period of twenty years. That corporation has the custody of the records, as is well known to all parties in interest.

The whole story of Americans or some American syndicate buying up the Panama Canal securities at a low price, or at any price, and then turning them in upon liquidation at a profit, is a fiction and a concoction. The money of the United States went to France, and was distributed to the hundreds of thousands of foreign owners, none of whom, so far as I know, were Americans.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLETT].

Mr. WILLETT. Mr. Chairman, because of the great demand for time and the desire on my part to be expeditious, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD as to certain references I desire to make by way of illustration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLETT] asks unanimous consent to extend the remarks he is about to make in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall have to object.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That will be a very dangerous rule, I can say to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD]. I apprehend that it can not be said in advance that the gentleman from New York is going to violate any rule of the House, and it will be a very dangerous thing for objection to be made in advance.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order on this question.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is nothing before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter before the House is the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MACON. That has been objected to. I ask for a ruling from the Chair upon the gentleman's objection. I do not care to hear it talked about. I want a ruling from the Chair as to whether the objection is sustained or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Why, the gentleman has a right to object. The request is for unanimous consent. The gentleman reserves the right while——

Mr. WILLETT. Of course this does not come out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman while he reserves the right to object?

Mr. WILLETT. Not in my time; no, sir. If he objects, let him object.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I do not desire——

Mr. MACON. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. WILLETT. Mr. Chairman, we have of late been witnesses of the most extraordinary proceeding on the part of the Federal Government which has shocked the country since the days of the old Federalist party. I mean the prosecution of persons on the charge of libel against the Government of the United States. This proceeding has for weeks been going on right here in the District of Columbia, under the very shadow of this Capitol, and seems to have been instigated, if not directly ordered, by the President.

We have heard much, Mr. Chairman, from the pushers of this prosecution on the subject of justice and liberty, but it is clear enough that to them justice is the mere harrying of those who criticise them, and liberty an abstraction either of ancient history or far removed from the longitude of Washington and the latitude of New York. To paint their feeling, one would have to paraphrase Hosea Biglow:

I du believe in Freedom's cause,
Ez fur away ez Paris is;
I love to see her stick her claws
In them infarnal Pharisees.
It's well enough agin' a king
To say what strong and frank is;
But liberty like that's a thing
That don't agree with Yankees.

THE FACTS.

The facts are these: Since and during the last presidential campaign the New York World and the Indianapolis News printed certain articles reflecting upon the Government of this country in connection with the purchase of the property and franchises of the French Panama Canal Company. On the 1st day of last December the President wrote and published a letter to his friend, William Dudley Foulke, in which he displayed great anger because of the stories in the newspapers in question; and in a special message sent by him to both Houses of Congress on December 15, regarding the charges of corruption by or on behalf of the Government in the matter of the canal purchase, the President announced that the Attorney-General then had under consideration the form in which proceedings for libel against Mr. Pulitzer, the editor of the New York World, should be brought.

Nobody will accuse the prosecutors of cowardice in selecting a victim. They have taken a great newspaper in the World and a great editor in Mr. Pulitzer. Let them win here, and every smaller editor and smaller newspaper will be cowed forever. I do not believe they will win. I do not believe that Mr. Pulitzer will be doomed to—

Sit in solemn silence in a dull, dark dock,
In a pestilential prison with a lifelong lock,
Awaiting the sensation of a short, sharp shock
From a cheap and chippy chopper on a big black block.

His present attitude is like that of Henry W. Grady on a memorable occasion. You know he was sitting in the office of the Atlanta Constitution one afternoon, when a tall, lank Georgian stepped in, drew a bowie knife, and stood over his desk. He said angrily:

Mr. Grady, the Constitution said this morning that I was dead. You see I am not dead. I am very, very much alive. You must print a retraction immediately, and print it conspicuously.

Grady was as calm as a churchyard on a summer afternoon. He said firmly:

Mr. Blank, if the Constitution said this morning that you were dead, you were dead this morning. The Constitution never makes a mistake. But I'll tell you what I will do as a compromise. I'll print your name to-morrow morning in the birth column, of course at regular advertising rates.

The man was so astounded that he dropped his knife. Grady picked it up—by the handle—and called an office boy to show the visitor the door. Mr. Pulitzer is evidently in precisely the same frame of mind.

It is well known that the old English doctrines relating to scandalum magnatum, or the libeling of the Government or of great public officers, has been rejected in all the States of the Union since the Revolution of 1776; and that it had before that time been rejected in England by the act abolishing the Court of Star Chamber in the reign of Charles I, about 1640, and had ever since been regarded as an unsafe, unreasonable, unjustifiable, and unconstitutional fiction; that the views of John Milton, expressed in his great speech on the freedom of the press, while he was a member of Parliament, and the views of Lord Erskine in his defense of Thomas Paine, when that philosopher had been indicted in London for a libel upon the British Government, have been regarded as fixing the law on this subject in opposition to the old despotic theory of paternalism, on which the present prosecution is founded; but the Government's attorneys are said to maintain that, though the principle that the government of a country, with a constitution like ours, can not be libeled, applies everywhere else in the United States; yet that the 64 square miles embraced in the District of Columbia are excepted from its application in consequence of the act of 1902. In the District of Columbia the United States is, according to those attorneys, to be treated as a person, and can be libeled as such. This singular contention, flying in the face of our Constitution and our traditions, is founded on a combination of certain provisions in the act by which the State of Maryland ceded to the United States the territory now embraced in the District of Columbia, in 1801, and section 1 of the Code of the District of Columbia, embraced in an act of Congress which became effective on January 1, 1902. That section provides that—

The common law—all British statutes in force in Maryland on the 27th day of February, 1801, etc., shall remain in force, except in so far as the same are inconsistent with, or replaced by, some provision of this code.

Perhaps it might have been better if the provision had been that those old British laws should be in force here, unless "inconsistent" with some provision of the Federal Constitution, instead of some provision of the Code of the District of Columbia. I can never be brought to understand how this newfangled code enacted by Congress in its capacity as the local legislature, or county court of this District, could by any possibility be construed as a federal statute, or confer any jurisdiction upon either a circuit or a district court of the United States. I think I can show that it can have no such effect.

But there is also another peculiar statute, first passed in 1825, and now known as section 5391 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, on which the prosecution in the present case ostensibly places much reliance. This section of the law is as follows:

If any offense be committed in any place which has been, or may hereafter be, ceded to and under the jurisdiction of the United States, which offense is not prohibited, or the punishment thereof is not specially provided for by any law of the United States, such offense shall be liable to and receive the same punishment as the law of the State in which such place is situated, now in force, provides for the like offense when committed within the jurisdiction of such State; and no subsequent repeal of such state law shall affect any prosecution for such offense in any court of the United States.

Now, upon this state of facts, on the 17th of January subpœnas were issued by the United States attorney for the District of Columbia for several newspaper men in Washington and other cities to testify before the grand jury in this city in the case of The Government v. The Press Publishing Company. The nature of the case was not disclosed by the subpœnas, but it is understood to be a case of criminal libel against the editors and proprietors of the New York World and Indianapolis News, involving charges of corruption made by those journals in connection with the acquisition of the property and franchises of the French Panama Canal Company.

Many witnesses have already been examined by the grand jury, including Elihu Root, former Secretary of State; PHILANDER C. KNOX, the future Secretary of State; William Nelson Cromwell, the lawyer who managed the transaction in which the fraud is charged to have been committed; Charles P. Taft and Douglas Robinson, whose names were mentioned in the newspaper articles as parties to the fraud; and many other persons. The managers of the telegraph companies and the reporters of newspapers are among the number.

Was such a thing ever heard of in this country before? Only once, Mr. Chairman, and that time it was condemned by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Now, unlike Mr. Gompers, and Mr. Debs, and the man higher up, I have a great respect for the Supreme Court, without assuming its infallibility. It was a very pompous judge, you know, who had before him a man convicted of murder in the first degree, and began the remarks preliminary to imposing the death penalty, thus:

John Smith, you are soon to appear before another, and perhaps a wiser Judge.

Our Supreme Court is not made up of judges like that. Its members recognize their own fallibility, but they are men of integrity, men of consistency, and they are likely to decide the present case exactly as they decided the former one—no dull, dark dock for Mr. Pulitzer.

THE LAW OF THE CASE.

Mr. Chairman, the courts of the United States have no jurisdiction in cases of libel against the Government of the United States. It has not been conferred upon them by any legislative act, and they possess no criminal jurisdiction derived from the common law.

The power which Congress possesses to create courts of inferior jurisdiction necessarily implies the power to limit the jurisdiction of those courts to particular objects; and when a court is created and its operations defined, it can with no propriety assume to itself a more extended jurisdiction, in its nature indefinite and applicable to a great variety of objects, varying in every State in the Union, and with regard to which there exists no definite criterion of distribution between the district and circuit courts of the same district.

The courts of the United States possess powers not immediately and expressly derived from statutes, only so far as to enable them to fine for contempt, to imprison for contumacy, and to enforce the observance of order—powers which can not be dispensed with in a court, because they are absolutely necessary to the exercise of any and all other judicial powers.

These propositions are based upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the celebrated case of The United States v. Hudson and Goodwin (7 Cranch, 32).

In the case of ex parte Bollman, reported in 4 Cranch, at page 75, the same court said that courts established by written law, and whose jurisdiction is defined by written law, can not lawfully transcend that jurisdiction.

Let me read to you the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Hudson and Goodwin, just referred to. It was delivered by Judge Johnson in 1812, and was concurred in by a majority of the great lawyers then on that bench, including John Marshall, Joseph Story, Brockholst Livingston, Thomas Todd, and Gabriel Duvall. It may therefore be regarded as the very best contemporaneous construction of the Constitution relating to the criminal jurisdiction of our federal courts, and has been cited with approval in many subsequent cases, references to which may be found on page 260 of United States Supreme Court Reports, 3 Law edition. It is a short case, and I will read the whole report, beginning on page 32 of the seventh volume of Cranch's Reports.

The United States v. Hudson and Goodwin (3 U. S., L. ed., 259, 260):

The courts of the United States have no common-law jurisdiction in cases of libel against the Government of the United States. But they have the power to fine for contempts, to imprison for contumacy, and to enforce the observance of their orders, etc.

This was a case certified from the circuit court for the district of Connecticut, in which, upon argument of a general demurrer to an indictment for a libel on the President and Congress of the United States, contained in the Connecticut Courant of the 7th of May, 1806, charging them with having in secret voted $2,000,000 as a present to Bonaparte for leave to make a treaty with Spain, the judges of that court were divided in opinion upon the question whether the circuit court of the United States had a common-law jurisdiction in cases of libel.

Pinkney, Attorney-General, in behalf of the United States, and Dana, for the defendants, declined arguing the case.

The court having taken time to consider, the following opinion was delivered on the last day of the term, all the judges being present, by Johnson, J.:

The only question which this case presents is whether the circuit courts of the United States can exercise a common-law jurisdiction in criminal cases. We state it thus broadly because a decision on a case of libel will apply to every case in which jurisdiction is not vested in those courts by statute.

Although this question is brought up now for the first time to be decided by this court, we consider it as having been long since settled in public opinion. In no other case for many years has this jurisdiction been asserted; and the general acquiescence of legal men shows the prevalence of opinion in favor of the negative of the proposition.

The course of reasoning which leads to this conclusion is simple, obvious, and admits of but little illustration. The powers of the General Government are made up of concessions from the several States; whatever is not expressly given to the former, the latter expressly reserve. The judicial power of the United States is a constituent part of those concessions; that power is to be exercised by courts organized for the purpose, and brought into existence by an effort of the legislative power of the Union. Of all the courts which the United States may, under their general powers, constitute, one only—the Supreme Court—possesses jurisdiction derived immediately from the Constitution, and of which the legislative power can not deprive it. All other courts created by the General Government possess no jurisdiction but what is given them by the power that creates them, and can be vested with none but what the power ceded to the General Government will authorize them to confer.

It is not necessary to inquire whether the General Government, in any and what extent, possesses the power of conferring on its courts a jurisdiction in cases similar to the present; it is enough that such jurisdiction has not been conferred by any legislative act, if it does not result to those courts as a consequence of their creation.

And such is the opinion of a majority of this court. For the power which Congress possesses to create courts of inferior jurisdiction necessarily implies the power to limit the jurisdiction of those courts to particular objects; and when a court is created and its operations confined to certain specific objects, with what propriety can it assume to itself a jurisdiction, much more extended, in its nature very indefinite, applicable to a great variety of subjects, varying in every State in the Union, and with regard to which there exists no definite criterion of distribution between the district and circuit courts of the same district?

The only ground on which it has ever been contended that this jurisdiction could be maintained is that, upon the formation of any political body, an implied power to preserve its own existence and promote the end and object of its creation necessarily results to it. But without examining how far this consideration is applicable to the peculiar character of our Constitution, it may be remarked that it is a principle by no means peculiar to the common law. It is coeval, probably, with the first formation of a limited government; belongs to a system of universal law, and may as well support the assumption of many other powers as those more peculiarly acknowledged by the common law of England.

But if admitted as applicable to the state of things in this country, the consequence would not result from it which is here contended for. If it may communicate certain implied powers to the General Government, it would not follow that the courts of that Government are vested with jurisdiction over any particular act done by an individual in supposed violation of the peace and dignity of the sovereign power. The legislative authority of the Union must first make an act a crime, affix a punishment to it, and declare the court that shall have jurisdiction of the offense.

Certain implied powers must necessarily result to our courts of justice from the nature of their institution. But jurisdiction of crimes against the State is not among those powers. To fine for contempt, imprison for contumacy, enforce the observance of order, etc., are powers which can not be dispensed with in a court, because they are necessary to the exercise of all others; and so far our courts, no doubt, possess powers not immediately derived from statute; but all exercise of criminal jurisdiction in common-law cases, we are of opinion, is not within their implied powers.

Libel, then, was not a crime against the United States in 1812. Has any federal law, as distinguished from a local law, been passed since that time making it such? None whatever. Libel may be a crime against the District of Columbia, as it is against the State of New York, but it is no crime against the Federal Government as such, nor has it ever been, nor will it ever be so long as Congress adheres to those principles on which the Revolution and the Constitution depended. Congress has not defined it in any federal statute, nor has Congress given any district or circuit court of the United States jurisdiction of the offense, for the reason, as stated by Judge Johnson in the Goodwin case, that Congress must first make an act a crime and affix a punishment thereto before it can give to any court jurisdiction of the offense. And certainly no reputable lawyer will contend that a statute passed by Congress, acting as a local legislature of the District of Columbia, can create a crime against the United States. This point was clearly settled in the case of Cohens v. Virginia, reported in Fourth Wheaton at page 268. The point in that case which bears upon the present question is stated in the syllabus as follows:

The act of Congress of the 4th of May, 1812, entitled, "An act further to amend the charter of the city of Washington," which provides (sec. 6) that the corporation of the city shall be empowered, for certain purposes and under certain restrictions, to authorize the drawing of lotteries, does not extend to authorize the corporation to force the sale of the tickets in such lottery in States where such sale may be prohibited by the state laws.

In this case a distinction was clearly established between laws of the District of Columbia and laws of the United States, the argument, in its last analysis, being this:

Every law of the United States is binding in the States;

No law of the District of Columbia is binding in the States: Therefore,

No law of the District of Columbia is a law of the United States.

It is evident that neither the Constitution nor any statute of the United States has been violated by the parties who are being prosecuted in this case. For, if the section of the District Code which affixes a punishment for libel were construed to mean that libel against the Government of the United States is punishable by an act of Congress, it would be repugnant to the provision of the first amendment of the Constitution, which declares that Congress shall make no law whatever abridging the free- dom of the press. And this is true whether that section be derived from a law of Maryland in force at the date of the act of cession or not, for certainly the act of cession would not abrogate the first amendment; but the latter, being a negative and self-executing provision, abrogates every act of Congress passed in violation of it, including even so much of the act accepting the cession of the territory now embracing the District of Columbia, as well as so much of the act of 1902 establishing the Code of the District as conflict with it. Where the Constitution limits the power of any department of the Government, or where it prohibits the performance of an act by any person or officer, it is absurd to contend that the power might be exercised or the act performed until prohibited by Congress.

If, therefore, the District Code or section 5391 of the Revised Statutes or any other act of Congress abridges "the freedom of the press" in the sense in which that term is used in the Constitution, such act is void to that extent ab initio. It would be needless to repeal such an act, since it was repealed by a higher law at the very instant of its enactment. In fact, it was prohibited in advance, and was prohibited in order to prevent such abuses as that of which I am here complaining. The men who framed the Constitution were apprehensive of the recurrence of such prosecutions for libel in political matters as those which had disgraced the jurisprudence of England and resulted in the Revolution of 1687. Their views were well expressed by James Madison, the author of the first amendment:

Prudent jealousy—

is the first duty of the citizen. The patriots of America did not wait until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled itself in precedents. They saw the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle.

John F. Dillon, Storrs professor of law at Yale University, in his work entitled "The Laws and Jurisprudence of England and America," published in 1894, quotes with approbation the language of Professor, afterwards Mr. Justice, Baldwin, in his address before the Ohio Bar Association in 1892 on the subject of criminal libel. He said:

The law of libel in any government is one of the surest tests by which to estimate its hold upon the people. The United States was the first to renounce for its rulers the protection of this law. When the decemvirs were framing the Twelve Tables of Rome, few as were the subjects they thought it important to cover in their code, they were careful to make libel against the State a capital offense, for they were the State, and they were turning a republic into a despotism. When the people of England were beginning to demand a greater share in her government, it was the law of libel to which the Crown resorted for its surest weapon of defense, and it was the pride of the English bar that, in criminal cases, they nullified it by the aid of the jury. With us in the United States the law of libel is unknown, because the Federal Government has no common law, and because the only statute ever passed by Congress to replace it on this subject was swept away in the first change of administration, and, indeed, in no small part was the cause of that change of administration; while in our state governments we have almost everywhere come to the position that, both in civil and criminal cases, truth is a justification, unless actual malice is proved.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I repeat this admonition here to-day in the presence of the representatives of the American people. And in connection with it I point to the most flagrant and the most dangerous exercise of usurped power ever witnessed in this country—a usurpation which seems to be intended to forestall this House, the grand inquest of the Nation, in the exercise of its right to investigate charges of corruption brought by responsible citizens against the administration now in power. And I warn you that no such usurpation should be allowed to entangle itself in precedents, lest by repetition the abuse become inveterate and despotism firmly established on the ruins of our Republic.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire whether the gentleman from Texas desires to go on?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I did not have the pleasure, being very busy with work outside of the Chamber of the House, to hear all the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], nor have I had time to read it. I have heard the debate here to-day, and I have been very much surprised that language should have been used in the debate to-day referring to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] as a "slanderer," read from a telegram or letter of a foreigner living in Panama; and yet the general morale and purpose of the speech and perhaps of the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. LOVERING. I would like to ask the gentleman if he refers to any remarks I made?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am referring to the speech made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT], and I say perhaps it was the purpose of the gentleman from Massachusetts to show that the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois were not true, and parties outside of this House should not be criticised, though connected one way or another with the Panama enterprise.

Now, gentlemen, I want to say this: That if you want to get at the bottom of this thing, why do you not pass the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, or some similar resolution, and get Mr. Cromwell to come before the committee and show clean hands, if not clean, and let anyone else who wants to appear before the committee do so, and call Mr. RAINEY or any other man in this House who wishes to discuss the question at issue, and have them face to face, instead of standing on the floor of this House and reading telegrams from a man from Panama, a country that the Republican party says is not capable of self-government?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. It has just started.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You have got to go down there and granny them every year or two, and the midwife is just coming away from there now. [Laughter.] Some of their people are coming here criticising the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] for his efforts to dig out the facts as he sees them, and in which he is asking the aid of the Republican and Democratic parties. You come here and criticise the gentleman from Illinois by calling him, at least indirectly, a "slanderer," reading a telegram from a foreigner from Panama. I say the manly thing, the square thing, the thing we owe this Government, the thing we owe Mr. RAINEY, and Mr. Cromwell at least, is to have this House pass this resolution which I have not read. [Laughter.] O, gentlemen, it is not necessary; because I know it seeks to get at the rottenness of the thing, if it is so, and the contrary if true—and if the Panama matter is rotten we ought to know it, and if it is clean we ought to know it and stop this abuse in Congress and out of Congress. Now I say this in all candor: The resolution ought to pass, or some similar measure, and the facts had, so that everybody can know what there is in this matter.

Mr. WILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MARSHALL. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to yield to another?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Not at present.

Mr. MARSHALL. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNON].

Mr. BANNON. Mr. Chairman, on January 29 the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] caused to be read in this House the prompt, explicit, and satisfactory denial of Charles P. Taft that he now has, or ever had, any interest of any kind on the Isthmus of Panama or in the affairs of the Panama Canal. This denial is in reality sufficient to dispose of the question in so far as he is concerned, and inasmuch as he has entered his own defense it may be wise not to add anything more; but for the reasons which I shall set forth I will, on my own motion, briefly discuss the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois in so far as they apply to this citizen from my own State. After the reading of the denial the gentleman from Illinois stated that he did not have the slightest desire of controverting the statement of Charles P. Taft, thereby absolving that gentleman from any improper connection with any of the affairs of Panama or the Isthmian Canal. For the purpose of explaining the matter to the House the gentleman from Illinois then said:

In order that what I said about Mr. Charles P. Taft may appear here in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in connection with his telegram, I desire now to read from my speech of January 26, and I read now, from the first column on page 1470 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for this session, the following:

"On Sunday night, the 27th day of December, Obaldia called to his palace certain members of the General Assembly, and they then and at that time demanded of him to know who the men were back of John Ehrman, representing that John Ehrman had no particular financial standing; and at that time they were told that the men who were back of this infamous, outrageous scheme were William Nelson Cromwell, Roger L. Farnham, his confidential clerk, W. S. Harvey, and Charles P. Taft."

The country will be glad to know that Mr. Taft's name is being used there without his consent.

You will observe that the gentleman from Illinois does not say that this extract contains all that he said about Mr. Charles P. Taft, but the fair inference is that it does contain all he did say about him, because his language is "In order that what I said about Mr. Charles P. Taft may appear——." But this extract was neither the only time that Mr. Charles P. Taft was mentioned by name by the gentleman from Illinois nor the only time he was referred to in his speech. The statement quoted contains no direct charge by the gentleman from Illinois. It is hearsay merely. The statement is that somebody told somebody that Mr. Taft was associated with Mr. Ehrman for the purpose of securing a timber concession. But that is not all. The gentleman from Illinois in his first speech went further. Based upon this mere hearsay the gentleman from Illinois made an unwarranted attack upon Mr. Charles P. Taft. I find that he said:

In addition to all this, a group of American financiers is seeking to obtain possession of all the timbered lands in the Republic of Panama on the Atlantic slope. This project for the spoliation of the country is not having such clear sailing as the other. Some opposition to it has been occasioned by the fact that the people of Panama have learned of efforts to bribe the officials of the former administration by the gentlemen interested in this project, and on account of that fact they are suspicious.

* * * * * * *

It will be interesting to know who the gentlemen are who are attempting in this way to impoverish the Republic of Panama.

* * * * * * *

Since the election of last November bread lines have commenced to form in the streets of our principal cities, and to-day in the Capital City, on Pennsylvania avenue, under the shadow of the Dome of the Capitol, a bread line appears daily, constantly increasing in length. If we permit the scheme of William Nelson Cromwell, Roger L. Farnham, Charles P. Taft, and the others to go through on the Isthmus of Panama, this Government will have there a bread line containing 400,000 people.

The men who are attempting to steal and to appropriate to their own use the revenues of this Republic are in reality about to impose enormous additional burdens upon the Treasury of the United States. To-day the deficit in the Treasury is over $74,000,000. If we permit these men to rob the Republic of Panama, we will place upon the United States the oppressive burden of providing a government for 400,000 people there.

Over three hundred years ago Morgan, the buccaneer, the original buccaneer on this continent, advanced across the Isthmus of Panama with fire and with sword, murdering men, torturing women and children, leaving in his wake the smoking ruins of destroyed cities. But he did not work half as much destruction on the Isthmus of Panama as these modern buccaneers of finance are trying to work.

Now, our duty ought to be plain. We guaranteed their independence on the Isthmus of Panama against all nations of the world. We ought to guarantee their independence against the outrageous demands of these modern buccaneers of finance. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

* * * * * * *

These patriotic gentlemen, therefore, are being permitted not only to rob the Republic of Panama, but indirectly to rob the Treasury of the United States, and in their efforts in this direction they have had so far the complete cooperation and the active assistance of the present administration and of the next President of the United States. [Long-continued applause.]

Here we have serious charges presented by the gentleman from Illinois against Charles P. Taft. He is charged with seeking to obtain timber concessions in Panama—a charge which is the more serious on account of the high position of his illustrious brother. He is charged with attempting to impoverish the Republic of Panama. He is charged with furthering a scheme which will form a bread line of 400,000 people in Panama. He is charged with attempting to steal and appropriate the revenues of Panama and impose enormous burdens upon the United States Treasury. He is characterized as a "modern buccaneer of finance." No wonder this speech brought forth a prompt and effective denial from Charles P. Taft. No wonder that Mr. Taft felt that he had been grievously wronged by it. And what was the basis for casting such an imputation upon an American citizen? Simply the flimsiest hearsay susceptible of being produced. There is no direct evidence. There is not even indirect evidence. There is not one scintilla of proof whatsoever; but, on the contrary, the hearsay even has been unequivocally denied by all the parties stated to have been present.

Mr. Chairman, the good names and the fair reputations of American citizens should not be impugned without clear and convincing proof, and there is no justification whatsoever to be found either in the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois or in the proof contained in the appendix to his remarks to sustain the aspersions cast upon Charles P. Taft and William H. Taft. These men are citizens of my own State and of that portion of the State where I reside. For honesty and integrity in public and private life no men in this Nation stand higher than William H. Taft and Charles P. Taft. [Applause.]

Under the Constitution no Member of this House can be questioned outside this House for what he may here say, and for that reason Members should be exceedingly cautious that their statements are borne out by the proof. Many people who read sensational charges do not read the denial. A sensational charge makes a certain class of news which some delight to read. But the denial of the person wronged is not so interesting. Mr. Chairman, the people of Ohio know Charles P. Taft, and they know that he is jealous of his own honor and too high-minded to do anything which would cast discredit upon himself or an administration in which his brother was a prominent figure or an administration in which his brother is to be the Chief Executive. The provision in the Constitution to which I referred a few moments ago was placed there to insure freedom of speech in the House.

It was placed there for the purpose of enabling the representatives of the American people to feel free to criticise any measure or any administrative or executive act. But it was not designed to furnish a medium of criticism and attack based upon proof wholly insufficient to sustain it. These characterizations of Mr. Taft, so unfair and unjust to him, were based upon hearsay, and the parties present at the conference at which it was alleged his name was mentioned now come forward and deny that any statement was ever made in their presence connecting Mr. Taft with timber concessions in Panama. So we not only have his denial, but the denial of all witnesses as well. But before the denial of these witnesses was published Mr. Taft sent a cablegram to the gentleman from Illinois denying flatly the charges made. Upon the receipt of that cablegram the charges were promptly withdrawn by the gentleman from Illinois. I submit that it would have been better and fairer to have addressed an inquiry to Mr. Taft, asking him if the charges were true before publicly making them. In other words, if a denial is sufficient to justify the withdrawal of the charges made, it is sufficient to prevent the making of charges. Mr. Charles P. Taft was recently in Washington.

He is a gentleman who is easily accessible to any person desiring to see him. Information that the charges in contemplation were not true could easily have been obtained before making them. This, it seems to me, should have been done.

It is gratifying to have these charges so promptly withdrawn, but the injury has been done. It is a good deal like plunging a knife into a man and then withdrawing the blade because you have wounded him. Those who know Mr. Taft of course gave no credence to the charges. Notwithstanding the fact that these charges are withdrawn, they still stand as part of American history in the records of the debates of this Congress. They are not only denied by Mr. Taft, but disproved by the witnesses and withdrawn by their author. I do not believe any of the language respecting Mr. Taft, uttered by the gentleman from Illinois, should remain as a part of the permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and if the gentleman from Illinois will not himself expunge such remarks from the permanent RECORD, as he ought to do, the House should expunge from the permanent RECORD all that portion of the speech of the gentleman from Illinois making reference, directly or indirectly, to Mr. Charles P. Taft.

As to the American citizen who will be the next President of this great Nation, it is not necessary for me to say anything. He needs no defender. The American people have confidence in him because they know him, and that is sufficient. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCCREARY].

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read by the Clerk, in my time, the following letter received from William S. Harvey, who was attacked in a speech made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] on the 26th of January last.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, February 3, 1909.

GEORGE D. MCCREARY.

DEAR SIR: On the 26th of January, in a speech in the House on the Panama Canal, Mr. RAINEY of Illinois referred at length to a proposal for the construction of a railroad and a proposal for the purchase of timber, which were under consideration by the Government of the Republic of Panama, and in that speech he referred to me by name as being one of those who are interested in what he calls "an infamous, outrageous scheme to despoil that country," and calls me and others "financial buccaneers."

At the time this speech was made I was out of the country on business and beyond reach of the telegraph. I have just returned and read the speech of Mr. RAINEY, made on the 26th of January, as well as his speech made on the 29th day of January, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. RAINEY said what he did, in respect to myself and other gentlemen, under the protection of his official position as a Member of Congress. As I am not able to refute his false statements in the public manner in which he has made them——

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I object to the further reading of the letter; it accuses a Member of this House of falsehood, which is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The language to which the gentleman objected, as the Chair understands, is this sentence:

As I am not able to refute these false statements in the public manner in which he has made them.

The Chair understands that it is not unparliamentary to refer to a Member's statements as false, if that does not mean to charge that the Member knew them to be false, that they were intentionally false.

Mr. BOOHER. The letter says it is a false statement, and that carries with it the presumption that the man knew that it was false.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was at first inclined to think that it referred simply to the statement as a matter of fact, and not to the knowledge that the Member had.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who sent up the letter to be read, be within his parliamentary rights if he was referring to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] as making a false statement?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be parliamentary to state that a Member of the House knowingly made a false statement. The Chair thinks it is within the bounds to say that a statement itself is false, if it does carry with it the suggestion that the Member knew it to be false. The Chair will refer to a former ruling on this subject. I read from Hinds's Precedents:

While in debate, the assertion of one Member may be declared untrue by another; in so doing the accusation of intentional misrepresentation must not be implied.

Mr. SABATH. Is this a statement of a Member?

Mr. BOOHER. It is not the statement from a Member; it is a letter from a man who has no standing in the House; and when he makes the charge that the statement is false, he makes it in such a way that it carries the presumption that the man who made it knew it was false. It is unparliamentary, and it ought not to be permitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the gentleman's attention to another ruling that has been made:

A declaration by a Member in debate that another Member has knowingly stated that which is false is unparliamentary.

Mr. BOOHER. But, Mr. Chairman, the distinction is that this is not a Member making a statement; it is a stranger, a man that has no standing in the House, and he charges that a statement made by a Member of the House is false.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It is impossible for the Member of the House who is criticised to rise and challenge the statement when it appears in the form of a letter, and for that reason it seems to me that the rule applying to a Member should be narrowed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the point of order made by the gentleman is effective, regardless of the language used, because the gentleman has no right to have any paper read in his own time if objection be made.

Mr. CHANEY. I understand it is a part of the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; it is being read as a part of his speech.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman can not have anything read as a part of his speech.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course he can; he can read it himself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He can not read it himself.

Mr. PAYNE. He can read it if it is parliamentary language.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He can not read it himself if objection be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think, on further consideration and examination of all the precedents, the point is such a close one, that if he errs at all he will err on the side of upholding the dignity of the House, and will rule in this case that the words "false statements" are unparliamentary under the circumstances, and will direct that they be omitted. The further fact that this language is in a letter written by a person outside the House, calling in question the words of a Member spoken in debate inclines the Chair to the full measure of strictness in dealing with the language.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object to the reading of the paper.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects to the reading of the letter.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I will read it myself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object for this reason: Here is a letter from a gentleman, stating his position. It is obvious that it will be of little use to have it read if some portions of it are to be stricken from the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the question to the committee, Shall the letter offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania be read?

Mr. BOOHER. Does it not require unanimous consent to have the letter read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that is a matter to be determined by the House by a vote.

The question being taken; on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 16, noes 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The noes have it, and the committee refuses to permit the letter to be read.

Mr. McCREARY. I yield back my time to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has yielded back his time to me, and I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 26916, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 13, 1909.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SALARY OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I desire to ask if the bill (S. 9295) in relation to the salary of the Secretary of State has been referred to any committee?

The SPEAKER. It is on the table.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. In accordance with Rule XXIV, section 2, I desire to know, then, if it will be in order to move that it be referred? If the Chair should be in doubt, I have a precedent which I think covers the case, holding that it would be in order to move to refer it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds the bill is on the Speaker's table, and the Chair is just having the calendar examined to see whether a similar House bill is on the calendar. This is called to the attention of the Chair for the first time.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds no such bill on the calendar, and on the point being made the bill will be referred.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Where will it be referred?

The SPEAKER. This is by unanimous consent. The attention of the Chair is called to it for the first time——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. To what committee will the bill be referred?

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary for a motion, if indeed a motion would be in order. It will be referred under the rule.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I desire to ask, then, that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair refers the bill to the Committee on Election of President and Vice-President.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know if the gentleman is authorized by the committee to make that motion?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not think it is necessary in a case like this. The bill has not yet been referred, and I am not asking for a change of reference.

Mr. MANN. The bill has just now been referred.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; it has not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Speaker just announces that it will be referred.

Mr. MANN. He announces that it is referred.

Mr. PAYNE. And also the further point that such a motion is only in order immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. I suppose a reference may be corrected if a bill is improperly referred.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I understood the Chair to say that the bill would be referred, upon answering the inquiry propounded by myself; and before it was referred, I moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that that motion is not in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, may I have the Chair's attention on that for a moment? If I recollect right, in the Fifty-sixth Congress this same question came up once before, before the present occupant of the Chair, when it was a question of referring a bill or resolution by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Hitt]. The Chair had started to refer, just as in this case, the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Hitt] desired to have it referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He called the attention of the Chair to the fact that he thought the bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Chair stated that he did not agree with him in that matter, but that it was the privilege of the gentleman from Illinois to move to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the gentleman made the motion and the bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Was not that a President's message?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; that was a President's message.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is not the precedent to which I referred and which I desired to read to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman says that it was a President's message?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that the same rule would apply to a message as to a bill. The Chair will read from Rule XXIV:

Messages from the President shall be referred to the appropriate committees without debate.

That implies that the House does it or may do it. The Chair reads further:

Reports and communications from the heads of departments, and other communications addressed to the House, and bills, and resolutions, and messages from the Senate may be referred to the appropriate committees in the same manner and with the same right of correction as public bills presented by Members.

That is, by the Speaker.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if I recollect right, this reference of the President's message as made by Mr. Hitt is not the only precedent. There are recent precedents, if my recollection is correct—and I have not had a chance to look it up—that it is in order when the Speaker refers a bill, if no intervening business has taken place, for a Member to move a different reference, and it does not come under the rule of requiring the committee to move a change of reference in a case where it has already been referred, but at the time of the reference it is in order, if I remember correctly, for a Member to move the reference to a different committee, and I think I have a precedent here, if the Chair will indulge me a moment.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I made that motion that it be referred to a committee.

The SPEAKER. The matter may go over temporarily. The Chair doubts if there is such a precedent. The Chair has no recollection of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I call the attention of the Chair to this on page 667 of the Rules and Practices of the House:

It is in order for the House to refer a bill to any committee, though such committee, under Rule XI, may not have original jurisdiction of such bill.

Reference is then made to the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, Journal, page 703.

The SPEAKER. But that is where the House has possession of the bill. The House has not possession of this bill. It is on the Speaker's table and, under the rules, is to be referred by the Speaker; and then, under another rule, if the majority of the House believes that it is improperly referred, upon a motion of a committee on any day, after reading the Journal, the House may refer it by a majority vote to some other committee. That has been done frequently.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand the precedents, however, Mr. Speaker, the bill this morning was on the Speaker's table when the gentleman from Texas called attention to it.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Speaker stated that he intended to refer the bill to the Committee on the Election of President and Vice-President.

The SPEAKER. That might be. As far as that is concerned, the Speaker wanted to be frank with the gentleman as to what the intention of the Speaker might be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. At the time the gentleman called it to the attention of the Chair the bill was in the House.

The SPEAKER. Not in the House. It was on the Speaker's table, under the rule, and subject to reference by the Speaker, and by the Speaker only.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I take it, Mr. Speaker, that under the precedents of this House to which I have just referred, the Speaker, under Rule XI, has the right to refer these bills, and yet it is a higher privilege for the House to refer them, and if any Member of the House desires a reference of a bill of this kind that is on the Speaker's table, he has a right to ask the House to make that reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman to the precedent that the House has no possession of a bill unless it be delivered to the Clerk to read, or the Speaker reads the title. That means possession of the House for action. The House can not act upon a bill until it is in the possession of the House. In fact, this bill is on the table under the rule, subject to the rules under the rule. The Speaker makes the reference and the rules point out the method of procedure to correct the reference if, in the opinion of the House, there has been an improper reference made, or whether it be proper it might always be subject to the rules for the action of a majority of the House as the rules provide.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the ruling of the Chair differentiates in this case between the present case and the case to which I referred a while ago in which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Hitt] moved to refer a message from the President——

The SPEAKER. The rule differentiates; it is not the Chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The message was on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Precisely, but the Chair again reads Rule XXIV:

Messages from the President shall be referred to the proper committees without debate.

That implies that the messages of the President come before the House for reference. Senate bills, by the terms of the rule, do not come before the House for reference. It is perfectly easy of solution. It is in the power of the House under the rules to correct an improper reference, or even if a majority desired to make an improper reference, where, as in the opinion of the Chair the House has sometimes done——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Let me understand the ruling of the Chair. The Chair rules my motion to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And that the bill will be referred to the Committee on Election of President and Vice-President.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will make the reference from the Speaker's table. It can be corrected if it be erroneous.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, I desire the Chair to make the reference of the bill.

The SPEAKER. And it might be corrected if, in the opinion of the House, the reference is erroneous. There is a House bill upon the subject which has been referred to a committee——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I understand.

The SPEAKER. And that is subject to correction.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I understand it; but I am not trying to correct it, I am asking that this bill be referred now—the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. It will be referred and has been referred.

AMENDING HOMESTEAD LAWS.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 24837) and ask for the present consideration of the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the following bill and that the same be considered in the House at this time. The Clerk will report, without objection, the substitute for the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 24837) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to amend the homestead laws as to certain unappropriated and unreserved lands in Nebraska."

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of an act entitled "An act to amend the homestead laws as to certain unappropriated and unreserved lands in Nebraska," be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the fees and commissions on all entries under this act shall be uniformly the same as those charged under the present law for a maximum entry at the minimum price. That the commutation provisions of the homestead law shall not apply to entries under this act, and at the time of making final proof the entryman must prove affirmatively that he has placed upon the lands entered permanent improvements of the value of not less than 40 cents per acre for each acre included in his entry: Provided, That a former homestead entry shall not be a bar to the entry under the provisions of this act of a tract which, together with the former entry, shall not exceed 600 acres."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Nebraska yield?

Mr. KINKAID. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understand the bill, and I hope the gentleman will correct me if I am in error. This bill is to permit a man to take 640 acres of homestead land and make improvements only to the value of 40 cents an acre in five years instead of the value of $1.25 per acre as now required of him.

Mr. KINKAID. The bill is rather to permit those who have already taken such homesteads, because nearly all of the lands subject to the act have been entered, to permit those who have been unable to make the necessary improvements—that is, to the extent of $1.25 an acre—to make final proof if they have lived upon the homestead in good faith for five years and complied in all respects with the old homestead law which governs still in this case, notwithstanding this exceptional requirement of specific improvements which the old homestead law does not require, to the extent of $1.25 an acre.

The Secretary of the Interior, through his field agents, has officially ascertained that very many of the entrymen will be unable to comply with this specific requirement clause, and he further finds through his duly authorized agents, that through the observations made of the operation of the act it is not only an undue hardship to exact the specific requirement, but besides it deprives poor men, which the homesteaders usually are, from investing the small means which they have in two or three cows and a span of horses or a span of mules, whereby they can make a living upon this homestead. Therefore it would be better to modify that specific requirement provision and get halfway back to the old homestead law as it has existed from its enactment in the first instance and as it yet exists. So the Public Lands Committee have reported this bill after having carefully examined all the evidence, including the strong appeals made by numerous entrymen, by letters depicting the adverse conditions with which they have to contend. Now, many of them live 30, 40, and, some of them, 50 miles from railways, in a timberless country, and fuel is very expensive there. It takes a great portion of their means with which to buy fuel, and lumber is high, as you all know. It costs a great deal to build a small shanty, and the fact is that many of their shanties have to be built partly of dirt, partly of sand, and they only have sufficient planks or common lumber to cover the top. Some of them build sod houses, and use only enough lumber to make the doors and window frames.

Mr. MANN. Now, will the gentleman yield? Under the existing law, the so-called "Kinkaid Act," a man may take up 640 acres for a homestead in this Territory, and is required to make during the time, before he takes out his patent, $800 worth of improvements.

Mr. KINKAID. That is the present law.

Mr. MANN. That $800 covers the cost of breaking the ground, as well as the cost of any buildings, barns, or anything else he puts upon his property, as I understand it.

Mr. KINKAID. Bear in mind that he does not dare break most of the ground. It will blow away and in extreme cases may cover up his house in a sand dune.

Mr. MANN. Now, under the gentleman's proposition, the land being chiefly valuable for grazing purposes, the gentleman proposes to do away with the necessity of any improvements upon the land, as an incentive for the man to remain there, and at the end of five years' time he takes out his patent and sells the land. The gentleman's land will soon be owned by a company that will own counties under this bill.

Mr. KINKAID. I will answer the gentleman that the express purpose of this amendment is to prevent that territory from falling into the hands of large landowners. Now, if these settlers are not to be permitted to prove up—that is to say, 50 per cent of them—as I am well advised, with less improvements than $1.25 an acre, or $800 upon the full homestead, many of them will have to abandon their claims and go homeless again. My judgment is that it is a proper policy that the law be so amended that when a good-faith entryman lives with his wife and children upon one of these claims for five years, as the law requires and as will be exacted of him, he shall not forfeit his birthright, as it were, or right to a homestead. He should not forfeit his right by reason purely of the fact that he could not make better improvements. Any home that will shelter him and his family for five years ought to be deemed in law a sufficient home for him in his humble condition.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will say that the last provision of the bill reads this way:

Provided, That a former homestead entry shall not be a bar to the entry under the provisions of this act of a tract which, together with the former entry, shall not exceed 600 acres.

Mr. KINKAID. That is the old law. That is not changed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As I understand this, it would permit a man who hereafter had a homestead, and could not obtain another one, to go in and take 480 acres of land under this provision?

Mr. KINKAID. That is right.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would not that be a double homestead?

Mr. KINKAID. No; because in this locality it is supposed that the three-quarters more are necessary to compensate in quantity or area for what the quarter-section homestead in that region lacks in quality and lacks in being equal to a quarter section in eastern Nebraska or in the humid region, certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Supposing a man should have had a homestead of 160 acres elsewhere in the United States, and should move to your State, he could, under this law, take 480 acres more in that country?

Mr. KINKAID. That was the law in the first instance, and it was restricted to this particular region because it was supposed to be equitable for those who had made a homestead in that region and took a quarter section; that they should be entitled to the same privileges as those who come later on and are entitled to take a section. The bill provided that those who are already there might take three-fourths more. The Committee on Public Lands and the Congress so amended my bill, however, as to let in former entrymen from other States.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Do you think it is right to allow a man to have two homesteads?

Mr. KINKAID. Congress passed on that, and that is the law. We can not now go behind the returns.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to call my colleague's attention to what is probably a misprint in the bill:

Which, together with the former entry, shall not exceed 600 acres.

It ought to be 640.

Mr. KINKAID. We will correct that; thanks.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KINKAID. I promised to yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], but I will yield to the chairman of the committee first.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House changes the so-called "Kinkaid homestead law" in only one particular. The original bill provided that the entryman should, in addition to the other proofs required under the homestead laws and five years' residence, prove that he had expended for improvements an amount equal to $1.25 for each acre of his entry. This requirement is in addition to the requirements of the homestead law, generally.

Mr. MANN. That was a concession, was it not, in order to get the act allowing them the right to take 640 acres?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman I think I was largely responsible for it. I rather insisted upon it as a member of the committee, and at the time believed it was right. Now, Mr. Chairman, one reason for it was this: This homestead law applies largely to a sand-hill country. In passing upon the bona fides of an entryman in that country the department must necessarily take into consideration the fact that in many cases he can not cultivate the soil, and therefore one of the evidences of good faith, to wit, cultivation, could not be proved in many instances; and in order, therefore, that there might be a specific requirement that would be considered in connection with other matters relating to the bona fides of the entryman, we laid upon him the obligation to spend $1.25 an acre in improvements. Now, the committee is of the opinion that the requirement is too onerous; and recently an inspector of the department, who went over the region and very carefully examined the conditions, reported to the Secretary of the Interior that in his opinion it would be in the interest of settlement and development if the requirement was reduced and the entrymen were not required to show improvements in excess of 40 cents an acre; and it was largely due to the fact that the agent of the department, whom we believed to be well qualified to judge—and his views are in line with my knowledge of the situation—that the committee adopted this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Is this land subject to cultivation?

Mr. MONDELL. There is a great deal of this sand-hill land that can not be cultivated. Cultivation in many instances would result in the land blowing badly.

Mr. MANN. Is it now being cultivated?

Mr. MONDELL. There is much of it that can not be cultivated. They utilize it in this way: The hills are used for pasture and the valleys grow native grasses, which make good hay. Some of the land is susceptible of cultivation.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says they have not even one cow.

Mr. MONDELL. I am informed that the inspector of the department recommended legislation reducing the amount of improvement required on the ground that the settler be allowed to spend his money to buy cows rather than be compelled to put improvements on the land that he could not afford, and which were not necessary to his residence upon the land.

Mr. MANN. How many cows does the gentleman think can be kept on a farm without $800 worth of improvements altogether?

Mr. MONDELL. I think all the cows that the land would afford pasturage for could be maintained by an expenditure of $100 in improvements on the land.

Mr. MANN. I am opposed to cruelty to animals.

Mr. MONDELL. One hundred dollars would build a shed.

Mr. MANN. That would be a shed for the animals—the man and his wife. I am opposed to cruelty to wives, especially in view of the recent report of the homes commission.

Mr. MONDELL. But I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this reduction still compels the entrymen to put $284 worth of improvements on his claim, if it be a 640-acre claim.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Two hundred and fifty-six dollars.

Mr. MANN. Including any work which he does himself. Now, does the gentleman believe that in that kind of a country, not subject to cultivation, used practically only for grazing purposes, it is as likely to be retained by the homesteader, after he gets his patent, if he has $200 worth of improvements as it is if he has $700 or $800 worth of improvements?

Mr. MONDELL. I think, with the requirement of five years' residence, that the homesteader is just as likely to remain, and perhaps more likely to remain, if he is not compelled to put more than $256 worth of improvements on his claim.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman himself were one of these entrymen and lived on a grant five years, according to the description which is given of it, with no improvements on the ground, and at the end of that time was offered a dollar and a quarter an acre for the ground by some grazing company, does the gentleman think the five years' residence would lead him to stay on the ground, or to sell and get out?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is no law, there can be no law that will compel men to live in a country where they can not make a living.

Mr. MANN. True.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, if after these men make proof, there be in a certain locality conditions which make it impossible for a man to make a living on 640 acres, he may not remain. You can not prevent that, and I think the gentleman does not want to prevent it; but I reiterate that in my opinion, with some careful consideration of the matter and knowledge of the country, I believe it is a hardship on the settler to compel him to put a dollar and a quarter's worth of improvements on the land, and I admit that I was somewhat responsible for the amount being placed at a dollar and a quarter originally.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that if there had not been some such amount in the bill originally, it would not have passed by unanimous consent, as it did in the House. Now the gentleman proposes to remove the very incentive for passing this bill in the first place, and make it so there is no reason why a man should remain on a homestead. You might just as well in the first place advertise this property to be sold in large tracts, because if there are no improvements on 640 acres, it seems that the man who has it will sell it. If he has improvements upon it, there is some reason for his remaining there, and it can not be sold so cheaply.

Mr. MONDELL. Many an honest man has made homestead proof with improvements much less than $280 in value, in my opinion, and I am of the opinion that this legislation is in the interest of settlement and development.

Mr. KINKAID. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the subcommittee, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that we went into this particular bill carefully and referred the matter to the Secretary of the Interior. The committee was satisfied that commutation should not be extended to settlers, but that they should be required to live five years on the land before they can perfect proof; but if the gentleman will read the report——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have read every line of the report more than once.

Mr. GRONNA. The agent appointed by the Department of the Interior to investigate and report on these claims recommends that the amounts of improvements to be made be reduced; that is, the amount per acre should be reduced to 40 cents. He believes it to be in the interest of the honest settler. The settlers must show their honest intention and good faith when they make their proof under this law, the same as they do under the general law. The agent finds that many of these homesteaders are unable to comply with the present law, and that it is a hardship upon them to compel them to have improvements to the amount of $800.

Mr. MANN. They do not have to make the improvements right away, not within five years.

Mr. GRONNA. They have to make the improvements before they can prove up.

Mr. MANN. That is right, but they do not have to prove up within the five years.

Mr. GRONNA. It is in the interest of the community that they should prove up as soon as they can, because the lands becomes taxable as soon as proved up.

Mr. MANN. After it is proved up it will be sold to some company for stock raising, and if this bill passes there will be no homesteaders left there.

Mr. GRONNA. If the committee thought that that was the intention the committee would not have favorably reported the bill.

Mr. MANN. That will be the effect. Wherever you propose to give a man 640 acres and require him to make no improvements and the land is not subject to cultivation with profit he will sell the land out to the first one that comes along and pays a fair price for it. It is worth more in the hands of large grazing companies than it is in the hands of the homesteaders so far as the use of the land is concerned, but so far as the country is concerned it is worth infinitely more in the hands of homesteaders than in the hands of these large corporations.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to have one of the gentlemen yield to me. I would like to ask if it would not be better to have 160 acres for a homestead and permit the homesteader to lease the surrounding public land for grazing purposes, and to hold the lands in that way instead of enlarging the homestead? Being a western man, I agree with the gentleman from Dakota, for I know the situation. I know that 160 acres of that kind of land is not sufficient for a settler if he is a stock raiser, and that they ought to have the right to lease four or five sections of public domain adjoining his homestead where it is only grazing land, but no one but an actual homestead settler should have a right to lease the public land adjoining him. Our State, Texas, had that problem before it twenty years ago and solved it by the leasing proposition, and this leasing system is the correct one; and until Congress sees fit to enact laws along that line nothing should be done toward enlarging homesteads on the public domain, as is done in this bill.

Mr. GRONNA. This bill does not change the present law in that respect.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Well, then, I will answer that the present law is wrong in making 640 acres a homestead instead of 160 acres.

Mr. GRONNA. This bill only reduces the amount of improvements from $1.25 an acre to 40 cents an acre. That is the only change made in the bill. I believe that it is right and that the bill ought to pass. It is said that the present requirement is a hardship to the honest settler. The money does not go to the Government. It is an improvement made on the farm. If a poor farmer comes there and settles and has but little money, if he is permitted to invest his few dollars in live stock, it is infinitely better for him than to be required to pay what money he may have in buildings or improvements. It is not necessary, I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in the law that requires that he shall invest money in live stock.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say that the man who has but $200 worth of improvements on his farm thinks just as much of that home as the millionaire does of his who has a home that cost $2,000,000. The settler should be permitted to invest what he can afford; what little he has above necessary improvements he can then invest in stock. You can build a sod house and keep it and make it comfortable for $75. I have seen such homes on the frontier, and instead of being required to fence all of this land, he can invest his money in stock. Many of them have children, and they can herd the stock. The grass only grows in little pockets between the sand dunes. In western Nebraska conditions are entirely different from what they are in our country. If this bill was to apply to our country, I should object to the bill. I opposed the bill last winter enlarging the homestead to 320 acres in my State, because I believed 160 acres was enough. I sincerely hope that this bill will pass.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 9295. An act in relation to the salary of the Secretary of State—to the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

EXTENDING PAYMENTS ON HOMESTEAD ENTRIES IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (S. 8510) to extend the time of payments on certain homestead entries in Oklahoma, and that the same be considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from consideration of the bill which the Clerk will read, and that the same be considered in the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 8510) to extend the time of payments on certain homestead entries in Oklahoma.

Be it enacted, etc., That the time within which all unpaid payments which have heretofore, or may hereafter, become due and payable under the act entitled "An act to open to settlement 505,000 acres of land in Kiowa-Comanche and Apache Indian reservations in Oklahoma Territory," approved June 5, 1906, and the act entitled "An act giving preference right to actual settlers on pasture reserve No. 3 to purchase land leased to them for agricultural purposes in Comanche County, Okla.," approved June 28, 1906, and the act entitled "An act to extend the time of payments on certain homestead entries in Oklahoma," approved March 11, 1908, be, and the same is hereby, postponed and extended for one year from the date on which such payments are now by law required to be made: Provided, That as a condition precedent to said extension in each case the settler shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, to be held in trust by him for the benefit of the Indians entitled thereto, 4 per cent on the amount of such deferred payments where the settler had no preference right, and 5 per cent on the amount of the deferred payment where such settler was given a preference right, but the payment of said 5 per cent shall be made in lieu of the interest payment required by said act of June 28, 1906: Provided, however, That no further extension of time than is granted by this act will be granted.

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to extend the time of payments to the purchasers and their assigns applying therefor upon the lots sold, or to be sold, in pursuance of an act entitled "An act providing for the platting and selling of the south half of section 30, township 2 north, range 11 west of the Indian meridian, in the State of Oklahoma, for town-site purposes," approved March 27, 1908, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to permit the unpaid purchase money for such lots to be paid in such installments and at such times as he may deem proper: Provided, however, That said purchasers or their assigns shall be required to pay interest on all such deferred payments sufficient to pay the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians 4 per cent interest on the payments so deferred, and to pay the local authorities entitled to receive the same the equivalent of the state, county, city, and school tax at the legal rate, upon such valuation as the Secretary of the Interior may determine, and to which the lots would be liable if patented, such extension of time not to exceed four years from the date of the approval of this act: Provided, further, That not exceeding one-half of the amount which may be set aside by the Secretary of the Interior, under the act above referred to, for the construction of two school buildings may be applied by the Secretary of the Interior to such other improvements as he may deem for the public welfare.

SEC. 2. That the extension provided for in section 1 of this act shall not apply to the following numbered lots in the official plat: Lots 4 to 14, inclusive, in block 5; lot 7 in block 9, lot 12 in block 10, lot 4 in block 12, lot 12 in block 13, lot 9 in block 14, lot 9 in block 19; lots 1, 10, and 11 in block 20; lot 5 in block 21, lot 11 in block 24, lots 8 and 16 in block 27, lot 10 in block 29, lots 9 and 10 in block 30; lots 8, 9, and 10 in block 32; lot 5 in block 33, lots 5 and 8 in block 34, lots 3 and 12 in block 35; lots 2, 3, and 4 in block 36; lots 6 and 7 in block 37, lot 6 in block 38, lot 13 in block 39, lot 9 in block 40; lots 2, 3, and 11 in block 42; lots 1 and 2 in block 44, lot 12 in block 44; lots 4, 11, 12, 15, and 16 in block 45; lot 8 in block 46; lots 4, 5, 7, and 13 in block 47; lots 9, 10, and 11, in block 50; lot 9 in block 51; lots 3 to 7, inclusive, in block 53; lot 9 in block 54; lots 9, 10, and 12 in block 57; lots 1, 2, 3, 9, and 16 in block 58; lots 2 and 3 in block 59, lot 9 in block 60; lots 1, 4, 5, 6, and 7 in block 61; lot 15 in block 66, lot 4 in block 2; lot 15 block 38; lot 2 in block 61.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Last year we passed a law extending the time of payment on certain lands taken in the old Indian Territory, and this bill proposes to give a further extension of time to the same parties, and then extend the time as to other parties who purchased under the act we passed only last year. Does the gentleman expect that these people will ever pay for any of the land down there?

Mr. FERRIS. Replying to the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to make this statement: In 1906 an act was passed providing for the sale of 505,000 acres of land to the highest bidder, and at the same time provided that one-fifth should be paid each year. The land sold for $10.56 an acre, under competitive bids, and along with that provisions of the homestead law were imposed on the settler, which is quite an unusual provision—to sell to the highest bidder and at the same time cause them to exhaust their homestead rights. The land was purchased on these terms, paying something more than $2.50 down at the first payment. Now, the improvements necessary to make when the bona fide settler complies with the provisions of the homestead law, and $2.50 per acre, exhausted, in most cases, what means they had. The land was not sold until the following year after the act of 1906, and the sod land when first turned over and broken out does not yield anything the first year.

The settlers are poor; they need this extension, and need it badly. Under the provisions of the bill the settler pays interest on the deferred payments, the Government withholds title till all payments are ultimately made, so there can be no chance for loss in any way.

Another and one of the most forcible reasons for extension is the fact that under the original act opening this tract to settlement the money is not available for the Indian if paid in, and the further fact that in this case the settler pays the interest in lieu of the Government; thereby it is a matter of economy to the Government and no detriment to the Government or the Indian ward.

I think both the Members from the East as well as from the West will bear me out in these statements. I hope there may be no objection to this very meritorious measure. It means much to my people. It costs no one a cent.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman remember the excuse which the gentleman gave last year for extending the time?

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. MANN. The excuse then was that owing to the financial conditions no one could get possession of cash, and it was upon that excuse that last year we extended the time.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, that was only one excuse.

Mr. MANN. That was the excuse stated on the floor of the House.

Mr. FERRIS. That was one excuse stated by some one, not by myself.

Mr. MANN. I think that was the only excuse stated on the floor.

Mr. McGUIRE. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. McGUIRE. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that it was the excuse assigned at that time that——

Mr. MANN. Does that excuse still prevail under the patented process in Oklahoma of guaranteeing bank deposits?

Mr. McGUIRE. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, to some extent that condition still prevails. It was not so much an excuse as a condition. I want to make this further statement——

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that since they guaranteed bank deposits in Oklahoma every bank has its vaults overflowing with currency and there is no possible danger of failure?

Mr. McGUIRE. I do not quite agree with the statement of the gentleman, provided he makes that statement as a condition existing in Oklahoma. I want to make this statement, in all candor, to the gentleman, that those people went out there and many of them paid more for their land than the land was really worth, and they paid more than they were able to pay for the land. They were frontiersmen——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not desire to take the time of the House, but I will say to the gentleman that so far as the excuses go for extension of time, there is absolutely nothing to it. There is no valid excuse offered; but it is claimed, and I wish to ask the gentleman in reference to that, that if this money should be paid in by these people and then paid into the Treasury of the United States, not subject to be paid to the Indians, that the Government would be required to pay interest on the fund remaining in the Treasury; whereas if this bill passes, the interest, instead of being paid by the Government, will be paid by the purchasers of the land.

Mr. McGUIRE. That is one reason why the bill should pass.

Mr. MANN. I want to know about the facts in regard to that.

Mr. McGUIRE. That is a fact. The party asking the extension of time pays this interest under this bill, and pays it when it goes into the Treasury, and it is a saving to that extent.

Mr. MANN. Why did not they think of that when they sold these lands, instead of putting the burden of paying the interest on the Government, and give everybody a fair chance to buy the land on even terms? What object was there when this original bill passed in having it any other way? Last year we passed a bill requiring the money to be paid into the Treasury of the United States so that we might have the exquisite pleasure of paying interest on it to the Indians. What is the purpose of that kind of legislation?

Mr. McGUIRE. As I remember the bill which passed a year ago, it provided that the settler pay the interest, and the Indian and the Government were relieved of all obligations.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman's bill provides for an extension of time to the people who purchased under the act of last March.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, if I can be permitted, I think I can answer the gentleman's question. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that the reason for requiring the Government to pay interest is the general proposition that we are to care for the interests of the Indians. This was not a new suggestion last year. Congress for decades has been providing that money that goes into the Treasury for the benefit of the Indians shall be held there by the Government, and the Government shall pay interest thereon to the Indians and continue to hold the fund until such time as the Government, the natural guardian of the Indians, theoretically if not in fact, should deem the particular tribe of Indians or the individual Indian sufficiently competent to care for himself, and then give him the money to expend for his own benefit. This was not a new proposition last year. We have been doing that for decades.

Mr. MANN. I appreciate that; but this is a new proposition now. Is this very much as though we had loaned this money to these purchasers instead of paying interest ourselves?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is very largely it, that we are loaning the money to the purchasers and they are paying the interest rather than to have the Government do it. In the meantime no title passes to these individuals until the full amount of money is paid in.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman consider that our security is fairly good?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is only one thing that can impair our security in the least degree, and that is Congress. If Congress in its supreme wisdom, as it did a few years ago, should pass something like the free-homestead bill, it might put the United States in a hole.

Mr. McGUIRE. The land is good.

Mr. SHERMAN. The land is good.

Mr. MANN. But gentlemen from the West a few moments ago said it was not any good.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is good as far as we are concerned. We are assuming no liability.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This is the only tract of land in the United States where the public sale was made to the highest bidder.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ALASKA SHORT LINE RAILROAD.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 23717) to extend the time for construction and beginning construction of the Alaska Short Line Railroad in Alaska.

Whereas the Alaska Short Line Railway and Navigation Company has made a preliminary survey for a railway line from Iliamna Bay to the Yukon River in Alaska; and

Whereas it has spent in surveys, explorations, reconnoissances, and preliminary work $150,000, as appears from its report to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under date of August 25, 1908; and

Whereas it has filed a preliminary survey of its entire route and a definite survey of the first 20 miles thereof; and

Whereas owing to the unsettled financial condition of the world during the two years last past, it has been impossible for such railway and navigation company to raise the necessary funds to prosecute the work on said railway: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That in consideration of the construction of said railroad being actually commenced prior to June 1, 1910, the time for the completion of the survey and construction of said railroad be, and the same is hereby, extended to a period of five years from said 1st day of June, A. D. 1910.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Of course the gentleman would not expect Congress to pass the preamble.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I was going to move to strike that out.

Mr. MANN. As the bill is drawn I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that without the preamble it would amount to nothing unless the gentleman amends by inserting the name of the road.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, I will ask unanimous consent to insert the name of the railroad.

Mr. MANN. And to strike out the preamble.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I was going to do that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? Does the gentleman from Washington move to strike out the preamble?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; and amend by inserting the name of the road.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. MANN. To strike out the words "said railroad" and insert——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. "Alaska Short Line Railroad, in Alaska."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, in line 3, strike out the words "said railroad" and insert "the Alaska Short Line Railroad and Navigation Company."

Mr. MANN. That is not the name of the road.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes——

Mr. MANN. This reads: "Alaska Short Line Railway, in Alaska."

The SPEAKER. Is there any other amendment the gentleman desires to offer?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; that is all. I ask that the bill be passed as amended.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CALAVERAS BIGTREE NATIONAL FOREST.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up again Senate bill 1574, the Calaveras Bigtree bill, and ask for its further consideration, with certain amendments which the Secretary of the Interior has suggested since the bill was here before; and if I may be permitted, I will explain the nature of those amendments, and then they will be understood before they are read.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the Senate bill mentioned, with sundry amendments. The bill and several amendments were read on a former day. The Clerk will report the additional amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 9, insert after the word "acquired," the words "shall be permanently held by the United States and."

On page 2, line 11, after the word "agriculture," insert the words "from the funds appropriated for the administration of national forests land."

On page 2, line 24, strike out the word "shall" and insert after the word "selection" the words "and of a value substantially equal to that of the land conveyed may."

On page 3, line 4, strike out the word "reserve."

On page 3, line 4, after the word "would," insert the word "substantially."

And after the amendment, on page 3, insert "Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall warrant an appropriation from the Treasury to carry out the terms of this act."

Mr. SMITH of California. Now, the purpose of the amendments offered——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I just want to reserve the right to object, for the privilege of making a statement in regard to the matter.

Mr. SMITH of California. This bill as originally drawn was prepared by the senior Senator from California four or five years ago, when the fund received from national forests was a continuous appropriation. The Secretary of the Interior later found that certain verbal changes should be made in order to conform to the present law. Then he adds a provision that in the exchange of land for the land on which the big trees stand it shall be only of the same value and not necessarily of the same acreage, thereby confining the exchange to land of equal value and not of equal acreage, which would thereby permit them, possibly, to get land of much greater value.

Mr. REEDER. Does it avoid the idea of issuing land script?

Mr. SMITH of California. I think there would be that element up to the point of the value of the land exchanged, but not to an equal acreage. We offered an amendment when the bill was here before limiting the amount of stumpage to that of the same value. Now, the Secretary has suggested that in the exchange of land it shall also be limited to land of equal value and not necessarily to land of the same acreage.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was up some days ago I objected to its consideration because I did not believe that the House had sufficient information as to its terms. Since then I have taken the trouble to submit it to the Secretary of the Interior, and I have from him two letters, which, with the permission of the House, I shall insert in my remarks, one relating to the proposed amendments which have been offered by the gentleman in charge of the bill, and the other in reply to an inquiry of mine as to the right of the United States to acquire land situate in a State for purposes such as these.

In regard to the latter inquiry, the Secretary does not undertake to answer the question, but does cite quite a number of cases where land has been purchased or acquired by the Federal Government. Many of those relate to cases where the land was taken under the war power of the Constitution. None of them, to my mind, are parallel to the present case, the nearest one being the case where land was acquired for the establishment of the Gettysburg Park, and which the Supreme Court held to be a valid exercise of power in the decision rendered in the One hundred and sixtieth United States. I am in grave doubt as to whether such right exists in this case. This question involved is similar to one relating to the Appalachian survey proposition, though without as strong grounds as those upon which that matter is predicated, and while I doubt the right of the Government to acquire this land, I am so desirous of having these big trees preserved that I shall not object to the unanimous consent requested, but shall leave it to the House to take what action it sees fit in the premises.

The following are the letters referred to:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 13, 1909.

Hon. SWAGAR SHERLEY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to a request for a report on S. 1574, a bill to create the Calaveras Big Tree National Forest, and for other purposes, the area described in the bill contains a large number of the Sequoia washingtoniana, as is clearly shown by House Report No. 1426. The land is now in private holding and the big trees are at the mercy of the owner of the land, who can sell them at any time for lumbering purposes.

This grove of big trees is one of the wonders of the world, and it would be practically a national calamity to allow their destruction. I am informed that if S. 1574 should become a law it will be possible to save these trees for the Nation. This can be done under the terms of the bill without any money cost to the Government.

The reason for providing three methods of making the exchange is because the owner of the land would be willing to exchange part of it for an equal area of other land upon the unappropriated public domain, for the reason that part of the land covered by the grove which it is necessary to protect is not so valuable but that other land of approximately equal value can be found.

The second method, namely, a "stumpage" exchange, will be necessary in order to furnish, without the appropriation of money from the Treasury, that which has an equal value for the exchange, namely, a quantity of timber in a compact body, the stumpage value of which is approximately equal to the value of the big trees, viewed as a possible supply of lumber.

The third method is the result of a partial promise made by the Outdoor Art League California Club, that will raise, if at all practicable, one-half of the money necessary to purchase this grove. By the use of the three methods it is practically certain that the grove can be acquired. I suggest, however, that before the passage of the bill the following changes be made:

1. On page 2, line 9, insert, after the word "acquired," the words "shall be permanently held by the United States and."

2. On page 2, line 11, after the word "Agriculture," insert the words "from the funds appropriated for the administration of national-forest land."

3. On page 2, line 24, strike out the word "shall" and insert, after the word "selection," the words "and of a value substantially equal to that of the amounts conveyed, may."

4. On page 3, line 4, strike out the word "reserve," for the reason that it was inserted when this bill was originally introduced by Senator PERKINS prior to the date that the name of "forest reserves" was changed to "national forests."

5. On page 3, line 5, after the words "which is," insert the word "substantially."

For your convenience, I inclose a copy of S. 1574, as reported from the House Committee on the Public Lands, with the above-suggested changes written into the face of the bill.

Very respectfully,
JAMES R. GARFIELD,
Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 13, 1909.

Hon. SWAGAR SHERLEY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In reference to your verbal inquiry concerning the constitutionality of the bill (S. 1574) to create the Calaveras Bigtree National Forest and for other purposes, I suggest that a question of constitutionality is one the discussion of which must be more or less futile. The courts alone have the conclusive power to determine such questions. I will therefore devote myself to a discussion of precedents in federal legislation.

Thomas Jefferson, at the time of the Louisiana Purchase, felt obliged to excuse the action of Congress in providing by the appropriation of money for the acquisition of foreign territory. In doing this he expressed a doubt of the constitutionality of such action, but excused the Executive and Congress for what they had done in the following words:

"The Executive, in seizing the fugitive occurrence which so much advances the good of their country, has done an act beyond the Constitution. The legislature, in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties and risking themselves like faithful servants must ratify and pay for it, and throw themselves on their country for doing for them unauthorized what we know they would have done for themselves had they been in a situation to do it."

The purchase of Florida, the Gadsden Purchase, the Mexican Cession, the purchase of Alaska, the acquisition of Porto Rico, and the Philippines are all notable examples where Congress authorized the expenditure of money for the acquisition of land for the United States. These cases, however, are the acquisition of foreign territory, which would seem to me less constitutional than to acquire territory within the United States for public purposes.

Some examples of acquiring private holdings within the United States are as follows:

Battlefield of Antietam, Maryland, condemnation of land for, act August 5, 1892 (27 Stat., 377).

Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park, located in Georgia and Tennessee, act August 19, 1890 (26 Stat., 336), condemnation and purchase of land for.

Vicksburg (Miss.) National Military Park, condemnation of land for, act February 21, 1899 (30 Stat., 841).

Shiloh National Military Park, act December 27, 1894 (28 Stat., 597), condemnation and purchase of lands.

Gettysburg (Pa.) National Military Park, act February 11, 1895 (28 Stat., 651), condemnation and purchase of lands for.

It is worthy of note that in all these instances the United States has appropriated and paid money for private land in order to devote it to the public use. In the case of the Gettysburg Park the constitutionality of the purchase has been decided affirmatively by the Supreme Court. (U. S. v. Gettysburg Electric Railway Company, 160 U. S., 668.) In all the above cases money obtained by taxation from the people of the United States was directly appropriated by Congress to acquire the land.

We now come to the action by Congress very much more analogous to the action proposed in the Calaveras bill. June 27, 1902, an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota,'" was approved whereby practically 225,000 acres of land in the Chippewa Indian Reservation were reserved for the United States to become a national forest; and an act passed last session, on May 23, 1908, entitled "An act amending the act of January 14, 1889, and acts amendatory thereof and for other purposes," contained specific provision at the end of section 2 for the payment to the Chippewa Indians for the land taken for that national forest at $1.25 per acre and for the lumber in the seed trees left standing.

The forest lieu selection act, which was repealed March 3, 1905, after being in force from 1897, was an act the constitutionality of which nobody has doubted. It provided that the Secretary of the Interior might acquire private holdings within national forests by patenting in lieu thereof an equal area of surveyed, unappropriated, nonmineral land on the public domain. Under this act millions of acres were exchanged. The analogy of this act to the Calaveras proposition is very apparent.

Very respectfully,
JAMES R. GARFIELD, Secretary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as to the amendments which the gentleman offers I got them from the Clerk's desk. I went over the original bill quite carefully, and I would not be able to recognize this bill from it. May I ask the gentleman where it endeavors to provide that people now owning land there may get the timber elsewhere upon a fair basis? Does that contemplate the amount of timber in forests which we acquire, or a fancy value on the big trees which we acquire?

Mr. SMITH of California. It says, "substantially equal to the amount of timber and wood on the land acquired." Foot for foot is what it practically provides for. He may exchange an equal amount of board measure for these trees.

Mr. MANN. That is estimated? That is the estimated——

Mr. SMITH of California. Estimated amount of wood or timber or lumber in these trees.

Mr. MANN. Without regard to valuation?

Mr. SMITH of California. It does not permit of any fancy valuation of the trees. When it comes to the trade it is on the basis of lumber for lumber, and not lumber for beauty.

Mr. MANN. Well, there might be a difference in the value of the lumber. That is what I want to get at. White pine lumber is worth one price and red fir is worth another. Is this to be an equal amount of timber based upon the estimated board measure, or is it an equal amount in valuation?

Mr. SHERLEY. Substantially similar value.

Mr. MANN. The bill says an amount of timber and wood substantially equal to the amount of timber and wood on the land acquired. It could be construed either way.

Mr. SHERLEY. The amendment is, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit, and it was for the purpose of having just such an amendment that I held up the bill—the amendment now offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] looks to an exchange of timber of substantially equal value.

Mr. MANN. Not equal value?

Mr. SHERLEY. Equal value of timber.

Mr. MANN. The present amendment?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. An equal value of timber and an equal amount of timber are two different things. The value of one of these trees may be $50 a thousand feet, board measure, as it stands, according to somebody's opinion. I want to know whether the construction of the department is that they give foot for foot board measure on the estimates, or whether the value of the amount now in the trees, estimated, outside in other forests?

Mr. SMITH of California. I think it is the understanding of the department that they shall trade on the basis of the lumber value of the trees and not on their extraordinary value by reason of their age, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. A tree has no lumber value until it is cut.

Mr. SMITH of California. It is estimated what amount of lumber is in it.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me very important to know whether we are paying a hundred dollars a thousand for these trees.

Mr. SMITH of California. We are to pay for the amount of lumber in them.

Mr. SHERLEY. I can state, I think, the department's understanding, having referred the matter to them, and it is that there shall be an exchange of lumber that will represent, substantially, the value of the lumber in these trees.

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes.

Mr. MANN. For lumber purposes?

Mr. SHERLEY. For lumber purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee and the amendments offered by Mr. SMITH of California were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of California, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. HOWELL of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 227) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver a condemned cannon to the Grand Army of the Republic.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to deliver to the order of Cola D. R. Stowits, quartermaster-general of the Grand Army of the Republic, one dismounted condemned bronze cannon, used in the late civil war, to be used by the Grand Army of the Republic for the purpose of furnishing official badges of the order: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States of America through the delivery of said condemned cannon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I desire to inquire whether it has been the custom in the past to furnish these condemned cannon to the Grand Army?

Mr. HOWELL of New Jersey. It has been.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know how many cannon have been furnished to the commander in chief of the Grand Army?

Mr. HOWELL of New Jersey. I have had a letter from the commander in chief of the Grand Army stating that they were about out of badges, and it has been the custom in the past to get these guns, out of which they are made, from the department.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

REPRINT OF BILL.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 27884) to amend section 6 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and acts amendatory thereof.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

UNITED STATES COURT OF PATENT APPEALS.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report the bill (H. R. 21455) to establish a United States Court of Patent Appeals, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that the minority of the committee have seven days in which to file their views.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reports the bill and asks unanimous consent that the minority have seven days in which to file their views. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, SOUTHERN DISTRICT, NEW YORK.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it be considered at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19655) providing for an additional judge for the southern district of New York, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill was read on a former day.

Mr. MACON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas objects.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 26916; and pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the Indian appropriation bill close at 2 o'clock on Tuesday, and that the time meantime be equally divided between the two sides, and be under the control of the gentleman from Texas, or the ranking Democratic Member present, and the chairman or the ranking Republican Member present.

Mr. MANN. That would be subject to suspension day on Monday and other privileged matters.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill; and pending the motion, the gentleman asks unanimous consent that all general debate be closed on Tuesday next at 2 o'clock, not to interfere with privileged matters, one-half of the time to be under the control of the chairman of the committee and one-half under the control of the gentleman from Texas. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 26916.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I understand a little more time on yesterday was consumed on this side than on the other side. I am informed at the desk that the Republican side used one hour and forty-three minutes, and the Democratic side one hour and eleven minutes. Under those circumstances, perhaps it would be wise if my friend from Texas would consume time enough to equalize.

Mr. STEPHENS. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. LAMAR].

Mr. LAMAR of Florida. Mr. Chairman, two years ago and more, and before the passage of the so-called "Hepburn railroad rate bill," I termed that piece of legislation a "delusion and a snare." I meant then that it would not give the producers, the consumers, and the shippers in the United States relief from unjust and unreasonable rates of charges by the railroads of the country.

In that sense, that the bill was a delusion.

I meant then, and foresaw that the existence of that piece of legislation, incomplete as it was, would be used as a basis for delay in enacting full and remedial legislation.

My prediction has been fulfilled.

Within the past few days, and in answer to a resolution of this House, the Interstate Commerce Commission reports that within two years last past, and since the passage of the Hepburn railroad rate bill, the interstate railroads of the country have largely increased their then existing freight rates, and that this increase has been done both by direct raise of rates and by the devious and insidious form of rate raising known as "change of classification."

The Congress has not shown any desire since the passage of the Hepburn bill to justify and fully protect the public from unjust railway rates.

And another branch of the Congress has just sounded the death knell of remedial railroad-rate legislation for a long time, unless the American people compel a reversal of their position. And I believe the attitude of that part voices the controlling sentiment of this House upon the subject of railroad-rate legislation. Mr. Chairman, that attitude of the Congress will operate to the interest of the railroads and not of the public. The effect of this position by the Congress will be to leave the larger public, their constituents, who produce, consume, and ship the products of the country, to the tender mercies of the railroads.

Turn over the lamb to the lion. Confide the sheep to the wolf. Drive the geese into the den of the fox. Then stand by and see what will happen.

In like manner will vanish the profits of those who produce, and get their products to market upon railway lines, if this needed legislation is never made into law.

Mr. Chairman, the producers, the consumers, and the shippers generally should at once and with vigor join issue with the attitude of the Congress upon this great federal question. Further amendments are vital to the efficiency of national railroad-rate legislation.

First. The Interstate Commerce Commission must have the power to prevent an interstate railroad from increasing an existing rate until the justness and reasonableness of the proposed increase has been first determined by said commission.

Second. The Interstate Commerce Commission should be invested with the power to prescribe a uniform classification of rates for interstate railroads, and that no such railroad shall change any such classification so prescribed without the consent of said commission.

Third. That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to make a physical valuation of the property of the interstate railroads.

Until these amendments, and others even, are adopted by the Congress, the Hepburn bill is mere "sounding brass and tinkling cymbal."

It is neither "fish, fowl, nor good red herring."

Despite its good features, without these amendments the Hepburn bill approaches the proportions of a legislative fake.

Without these amendments the Hepburn bill leaves in the hands of the railroads of the country the uncontrolled power of taxation, practically, upon the transportation of interstate shipments. This power of railroad taxation is a governmental function; it is a privilege of the sovereign. There are but two sovereigns in the United States. One is the Nation, the United States, the higher sovereign. The other sovereign or sovereigns is and are the State and the States of the American Union. These sovereigns will be false to the people who constituted them if they permit longer the creatures of the sovereigns to despoil the people.

And what are the railroads of the country, Mr. Chairman?

The railroads are but the chartered servants of the people.

Mr. Chairman, there should be war between the people and their agents, the Federal Congress, until the people get their rights. The first line of battle should be drawn in array against the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives. And before this great legislative reform can come it is necessary, in my opinion, that there should be reform in the Congress of the United States. Let me sketch the bare outlines of this vital legislative reform.

First. No man should hold the office of United States Senator or Member of the House of Representatives who holds and owns stock and bonds in the railroads in the United States or is a director or other officer in such railroads.

Second. No person should be a Member of the United States Senate or the House of Representatives who is the retained counsel and attorney of such a railroad or railroads.

Third. No person should be a Member of the United States Senate or of the National House of Representatives who practices as attorney at law in the courts of the country, either state or federal, in behalf of railroads, even though they are not the general retained attorneys of such railroads.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMAR of Florida. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. How could you disqualify him except by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. LAMAR of Florida. I will answer the gentleman in this way.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Not expressing a different opinion, I should like to know what the gentleman's opinion is as to the power of Congress to regulate this?

Mr. LAMAR of Florida. I hold that in some way action should be taken by the Congress, and by the American people, to enact into law, and if not possible, then to write into the moral laws by legislative expression, the principle that a man shall not be a public servant of the people and an attorney for a great corporation at the same time. [Applause.] I contend further that he should not be allowed to practice in the courts of the land, state or federal, in behalf of railroads, or accept gifts from large public-service corporations in the shape of fees. The principle goes to the very foundation of the Government.

Fourth. That no Member of the United States Senate or of the House of Representatives shall be an attorney, either general or special, of an industrial, or manufacturing, or commercial trust of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, let the Congress of the United States enact the above prohibitions and inhibitions into law, and the country will at once have taken a long step to settle problems that now vex and harass the industrial and commercial, and I might say, in the highest sense, the moral life of the people of the United States.

Three short years ago it was considered neither indecent nor disreputable for a United States Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives to ride on a free railroad pass, or use a free telegraph, free Pullman, and free express frank.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a criminal offense if they do these things. The country and the Congress have moved a step forward.

And by what reason, tell me, can a man sit in the United States Senate or House of Representatives, barred by law from accepting one of these minor gifts from public-service corporations, and yet get the more substantial reward that flows from remunerative attorneyships of such corporations? And the vice, essentially, of this relation of Senators and Representatives as attorneys to the public-service corporations lies in the fact that these same Senators and Representatives, as American legislators, must pass upon the moneyed interests of their corporation clients, when, in many cases, the moneyed interests of their corporation clients are directly and wrongly opposed to the proper interests of their public constituents and clients, the people.

Mr. Chairman, the whole thing is wrong in political morals, and if possible, like the free railroad pass, should be made a crime and a disqualification to hold a great federal legislative office. A United States Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives who at the same time draws a salary from the people and a salary from or makes money by attorneyship to the railroads or trusts constitutes himself both the public servant of the people and the private servant of the corporations. Mr. Chairman, not my language, but his own position, voluntarily assumed, fixes such Senator or Representative in this double and, in my opinion, improper legislative relation to the people and the corporations.

Now, permit me to discuss the propriety of the amendments that I have herein named.

First. That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to pass upon and suspend a proposed increase of a railroad rate until a hearing is had and a determination made by the commission upon the justness and reasonableness of such proposed increase of rate. Upon this proposed amendment a branch of the Congress has lately adversely reported, and I have every reason to believe that this proposed amendment will be voted down by this House. While the Hepburn railroad rate bill was being considered more than two years ago in the Committee of the Whole House, I offered the following amendment, and it was voted down—voted down by Democrats and Republicans alike. Here is the amendment:

On page 6, line 6, after the word "force," insert the following:

"That when any notice of advance in rates, fares, or charges shall be filed with the commission, the said commission shall have authority to inquire into the lawfulness of such advance and make orders in respect thereof to the same effect as if such advanced rate, fare, or charge were actually in force. The provisions of this section shall also apply to notice of any change in classification of freight or other regulations affecting rates."

Now, Mr. Chairman, against the action and sentiment of the Congress I place both reason and authority. Is it not but just that a railroad rate that has been operated under, probably for years, be not suddenly increased? And if such an increase be proposed and intended by a railroad company, is it not proper and but just that its justness and reasonableness be inquired into and established by the Interstate Commerce Commission before it goes into effect as against the shipper?

"But," say the railroads, "the increase may be just and may be necessary to the proper conduct of our business."

"But," say the people, the shippers, "your increase may be very unjust, and may be but a mere grab of so much unjust tribute out of our products."

Mr. Chairman, which should prevail—the view of the railroads or the view of the people? I say the latter. They are the weaker of the two. The railroad is more powerful than the shipper. The railroad is richer than the shipper.

If the railroad may be kept out of a just increase of a rate under this amendment, then I say that without this amendment the shipper has been already, and will again a thousand times be mulcted in unjust, improper, and unreasonable increases of rates.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, the authority of opinion is against the Congress in their action upon this proposed amendment. Many years ago President McKinley appointed what was known as the "Industrial Commission." That commission was composed of 4 United States Senators, 4 Members of the House of Representatives, and 10 prominent business men from different sections of the country engaged in different lines of business. This commission was authorized to and did take testimony for two or more years in every part of the United States upon the great and leading lines of business. Their elaborate report was embodied in many volumes. One of these volumes treated of the great transportation problem, treated of the railroad problem, and its relation to the people of the United States.

Among the findings of that commission and among its recommendations to be made into the law of the land was this very proposed amendment that I first herein named. Their recommendation was that the Interstate Commerce Commission have the power to prohibit an increase in an existing railroad rate until an adjudication could be had by the commission of the justness and reasonableness of the proposed increase. Their recommendation grew out of a consideration of circumstances that happened in my State, the State of Florida. I quote their recommendation:

The entire inadequacy of making rate regulation dependent upon the mere determination of rates as applied in the past, without reference to the rates which shall prevail in the future, is apparent on all sides. More than this, all remedy for the parties who have borne the burden of an unreasonable rate would seem to have been removed. This has been clearly described in the report of the commission for 1897. It may be illustrated by the example of rates upon oranges. In 1890 there was a sudden advance on rates from Florida to New York from 30 to 40 cents. The commission after an investigation ordered that the rate be reduced to 35 cents. As a matter of fact, how could this action redress grievances of those who had already paid 40 cents per box?

It was difficult, in the first place, to discover who bore the burden of the unreasonable charge; and, in the second place, it was certain that some of those who suffered could not legally sue in court. The actual shipper, who alone could sue for repayment of unreasonable charges, was a middleman, who recouped himself in any event, either from the grower, the consumer, or both. He lost nothing by reason of the unreasonable rate. As a matter of fact, not any single individual, but the locality, had been mulcted by 5 cents per 100 pounds, supposing that a rate of 40 cents was unreasonable. Experience shows that almost no shippers, or other parties injured, actually attempt to secure the restitution of moneys already paid for unreasonable charges. In only 5 out of 225 cases down to 1897 was a rebate actually sought, and in those cases $100 was the maximum sought to be recovered. As a matter of fact, the damage inflicted by the existence of such an unreasonable rate could not be measured by hundreds or perhaps by hundreds of thousands of dollars. The bearing of this citation is to show that any effectual protection to the shipper must proceed from adjudication of the reasonableness of rates before, and not after, they have been paid—that is to say, in advance of their exaction by the carrier. Power to pass upon the reasonableness of such rates prior to their enforcement, as a consequence, constitutes practically the only safeguard which the shipping public may enjoy.

So it seems, Mr. Chairman, that a body of Senators and Representatives and prominent business men, conservative in their nature and character, after full investigation for years upon the great problem of the relation of the railroads to the people and the transportation of their products, recommended, many years ago, that the Congress enact into law the identical amendment that I am now advocating. Thus I place the opinions of the Industrial Commission, appointed by William McKinley, against the opinions and votes of the Congress.

Again, Mr. Chairman, against such opinions and votes I place also the recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission as made in its last two annual reports to the Congress of the United States. And who are the Interstate Commerce Commissioners? Men of the highest character, taken from the different walks of professional and business life in the United States, men who have lived their lives in the eyes of the public, and who, in character and ability and in public reputation, will compare favorably with Members of the United States Senate or of the House of Representatives. And in addition to their high character and intelligence, they add the very vital fact that they are disqualified by law from any participation in law practice for corporations, or in holding or owning any of the bonds and stocks of the railroads of the country. They are made by law arbitrators between the railroads and the people. Without having the functions of judges and of courts, they are compelled by law to have the qualifications of judges, in that they must not have a money interest in the matters they decide upon. They must be disinterested men, absolutely so, so far as their removal from any alliance with corporations can constitute them such. Can as much be said for the Congress?

And what does the Interstate Commerce Commission recommend? I quote from their 1907 report.

And bear in mind that these annual reports are addressed "to the Senate and House of Representatives."

These are the lawmakers of the people of the United States.

I quote what is germane to the amendment that I advocate, viz:

RESTRAINT OF ADVANCES IN RATES PENDING PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION.

Under the operation of the interstate-commerce act the right to initiate interstate rates rests entirely with the railway, which may, by giving thirty days' notice, put into effect any rate or any regulation or practice affecting a rate which it sees fit. The commission is not required to approve these rates and has no authority whatever to condemn them. It can only act upon a rate so established by the railway in case a formal complaint is filed attacking that rate and after a full hearing. This is the express provision of the statute.

* * * * * * *

When, however, the carrier advances a rate or so changes a regulation or practice as to impose upon the shipping public a higher charge or some more onerous condition, an entirely different question is presented. Railway rates enter to a greater extent than might at first thought be supposed into the business operations of this country. The contracts of the coal operator, for example, run for a year, frequently for two years, and the margin of profit is such that an advance in the transportation charge of no more than 5 or 10 cents per ton may convert a profitable contract into a losing one. Engagements for the sale of grain are made upon the basis of the present rate, and an advance of 1 cent per 100 pounds may entail a loss in the transaction. The lumber manufacturer may arrange for his season's cut upon the basis of the existing tariff, and a change may mean disaster to his business.

The above examples are not fancied cases. They have all been brought to the attention of the commission within the past year in such a form as to present strong grounds for relief.

* * * * * * *

We therefore recommend that when an advance in rates or a change in any regulation or practice is attacked by complaint to this commission, the commission shall have the power, in its discretion, after notice to and hearing of the parties, to prohibit the taking effect of the advance or change until the matter has been fully heard and determined.

I now quote the 1908 report of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the necessity of conferring upon it the power that I have been advocating:

RESTRAINT OF RATE ADVANCES PENDING PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION.

In our last annual report attention was called to the fact that this commission had no authority to restrain an advance in rates or a change in rule or regulation which imposes an additional burden. Railways may establish whatever interstate rates they choose.

* * * * * * *

It would be easy to multiply instances and illustrations showing the confusion and discrimination which now exist. We renew our recommendation of one year ago, that this commission be given authority to restrain the advance of a rate or the change of a rule, regulation, or practice pending proceedings before it to determine the reasonableness of the advance or the change, and we earnestly call attention to the necessity for immediate action.

So a report is made by a board of honest and intelligent experts upon legislation vital to the business interests of the country in 1907 and emphatically repeated in 1908, and Congress indefinitely defers passing such legislation.

And the Members of Congress, the agents of the people. Truly, Mr. Chairman, it is a remarkable spectacle.

So it appears that seven Interstate Commerce Commissioners, men of the highest character and intelligence, separated by law from every motive of self-interest, with reference to corporation holdings or money making, and some of these commissioners having been such for ten or twelve years and of the highest experience in the business committed to their care, recommend to the Congress of the United States that this identical amendment that I advocate be enacted into law.

Mr. Chairman, do I exceed the bounds of reason or of propriety when I say that the opinions of the Industrial Commission and the opinions of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners should be accepted by the country at large as of more value and carrying more authority than the opinions of any members of any committee in the Senate of the United States or in the House of Representatives? I think I state the truth literally when I say that the country at large will be more disposed to accept as authoritative upon this amendment the opinions of the Industrial Commission and the opinions of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners rather than the opinions of the United States Senate and of this House of Representatives. And if the public at large believes that the Industrial Commission is correct in its recommendations, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission is correct, and that Senators and Representatives are all wrong in this matter, then I inquire, What is the public going to do about it? Will the producers and consumers and shippers of the United States sit down tamely and let the American Congress defer indefinitely favorable action upon this proposed amendment of relief to the American shippers? Mr. Chairman, I think not. I think a clash will come between the electors of the country and their Senators and Representatives. In that clash one or the other must prevail. I find no difficulty in predicting which one will prevail. The people will prevail.

The second amendment I refer to for the relief of the shippers is that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to prescribe for the interstate railroads of the country a uniform classification of railroad rates, and that the said commission shall have further power to prohibit any railroad from changing any classification of rates without the consent of said commission.

Mr. Chairman, if there is a devious, crooked, disreputable method known to railroad traffic men of increasing railroad rates unseen by the country, it is this shifting and fraudulent device of change in classification of railroad rates. The Industrial Commission that I have heretofore alluded to reported upon this very subject of classification. It set out the method by which railroads increased their rates of charges without doing it directly, but by the subtle method of merely changing the classification of rates. The mere removal of a rate from one classification bearing one rate of charge, and a low one, to another classification bearing another rate of charge, and a higher one, and the increase of rate is thus effected.

As practiced by the railroads of the country upon the shippers of the country, these changes in classification are, in part, unadulterated rascality. In answer to the resolution of this House, the Interstate Commerce Commission has reported, in writing, to this House within the past few days that the interstate railroads of the country have in the past two years, and since the passage of the Hepburn railroad bill, increased their rates of charges over former rates, and have done it, in part, by this practice of change of classification. And their report shows that the South gets hit the hardest by these increased rates.

I do not know how all the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in this House stand upon the single proposition of classification of freight rates; but one member of the committee, and an able member, too—the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON]—in the discussion of the Hepburn bill in this House two years ago, declared that his committee—meaning the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee—had heard very little complaint about classification. Mr. Chairman, I have pointed out in speeches that I have made on the floor of this House for several years the fraud and wrong and injury done to the shippers of the country by the changes in classification of railroad rates. In some of those speeches that I have made I have embodied the findings of the Industrial Commission upon this question and the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon this question. The Industrial Commission condemned it, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, for ten or fifteen years past, have condemned the practice of railroads in their wrongful raise of freight rates by the arbitrary change of their classification of rates.

Mr. Chairman, if the entire committee in this House on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have failed to hear, as the gentleman from Alabama failed to hear, the great volume of denunciation against this wrongful practice by the railroads, then I am inclined to believe that if the Dome of the Capitol were to crash down upon the floor of the Rotunda that not a member of that committee would hear the noise. I think some of that committee differ with the Member from Alabama.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman recalls that in the last Congress, when the Hepburn bill was passed, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Davey], the ranking Member on the minority of that committee, by authority of the minority members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, introduced a bill which did contain the provision giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to change and fix classification, so that the gentleman from Florida has forgotten or is mistaken in his idea that some members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee have not endeavored to reach that evil.

Mr. LAMAR of Florida. I just made the statement I knew some of them favored it, but what does the minority of a committee amount to if the views of that minority, even though correct, can not be crystallized into a bill on the floor of the House by the majority? That is the point.

As far back as 1897 the Interstate Commerce Commission reported upon this gross abuse to the Congress. I quote from their report in 1897:

> These considerations of the necessity for reform in this regard, the universal demand for a uniform classification, the ten years of appeal to the carriers by the commission and by Congress to adopt a consolidated and single system for the whole country, the "representations" by the carriers themselves, their former efforts to that end, the energy at one time displayed by them, and the apparent apathy that marks their attitude toward the subject to-day, all lead the commission to the renewed recommendation that Congress provide for such uniformity by prompt and appropriate legislation. Carriers subject to the act should be required within a specified time, not longer than one year, to prepare, publish, and file with the commission a uniform classification of freight as the basis of rates for the transportation of property in the United States, and the commission should be authorized and directed upon investigation from time to time to make such amendments as may appear to be reasonable and necessary. In case the railroads refuse or neglect within the time specified to comply with this direction, the commission should be authorized and required to prepare such classification, the adoption of which by all carriers, subject to regulation, shall be made compulsory by suitable penalty. In view of the continued nonaction of the carriers, and the action already had in Congress, it might be the wiser to pass the bill now pending in the Senate.

So it seems that these commissioners, of high character and understanding and skilled by long practice in the business of their office, have, in the interest of decency and of honorable dealing on the part of the railroads, recommended time and again that the Congress of the United States empower them to compel the railroad companies to make a uniform or proper classification of their rates, and on failure on their part to do so, that the commission itself be empowered to make such uniform classification of rates for the railroads.

And, Mr. Chairman, at the very time of the passage of the Hepburn railroad rate bill by this House, or very near that time, a convention of state railway commissioners was held in this city. Members of each state railway commission in the United States, or a great number of them, met in this city to confer upon the question of needed national legislation upon the railroad problem. And here is the resolution that that convention of state railway commissioners agreed upon and passed and directed their secretary to send a copy of to the Senate and the House of Representatives:

> Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that Congress enact a law requiring the railroads engaged in interstate commerce throughout the United States to within two years after the passage of such act prepare and adopt a uniform classification of freight articles; and in case they fail to do so within the time required, that the Interstate Commerce Commission at once proceed to make such classification, and when so made by such commission the same shall be the legal classification for interstate shipments.
> That the secretary forward a copy of this report to the Senate and House of Representatives, and call their attention to the former reports of this association on this subject.

And, Mr. Chairman, mark the language embraced in this resolution. They not only instructed their secretary to forward their report to the Senate and House of Representatives, but they further instructed him to call the attention of the Senate and of the House of Representatives to "former reports of this association on this subject."

In the State of Florida, and at the head of its state railroad commission, is the Hon. R. Hudson Burr, an ex-member of the Florida legislature, who for years has been one of the state railroad commissioners. I believe he has attended, since his election to that office, for years, every annual convention of state railway commissioners. His opinion is valuable upon this subject, and I quote it here for the benefit of those who may read these remarks. It was in a letter addressed to me about the time that the Hepburn bill was pending in this House. The letter is as follows, and he writes about the Hepburn rate bill:

> I see that it gives no supervision whatever over the classification. While this bill may prevent the railroads from raising or lowering a rate or freight tariff, it will amount to very little if the railroads are to be the sole judges of classification, for that has always been the favorite instrument in their hands for tampering with rates. It is possible to change whole tariffs almost by use of the classification, and it is done.
> For instance, the Florida railroad commission, when it first organized, adopted what was known as "Southern classification No. 25" as the Florida classification. In about two years' time the southern classification had been changed until something like 500 articles in classification No. 25 had been raised, and at that time the railroad commission revised the Florida classification, placing back the articles thus raised by the railroads, and adopted what was known as the "Florida classification No. 1," and now we find that again each year, when the traffic managers have met for the purpose of going over these matters, they have raised items in the southern classification until it differs materially from our classification. If they used the Florida classification on interstate shipments into Florida, it would not affect us so badly; but where the southern classification is higher they use it, and if in a remote case an item should be higher in the Florida classification they would use that. In other words, they use that which results in the highest rate.
> It seems to me that it would be a farce to pass a bill enlarging the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission in which they were given the right, where complaint is made of the unreasonableness of a rate, and after hearing, etc., to substitute in lieu thereof a just and reasonable rate, to leave the classification entirely in the hands of the railroad people. The commission should have supervision of the classification to the same extent that they are given supervision over the rate; that is, where an article is classed in a manner to make it unreasonable and unjust, that upon complaint, investigation, and hearing the commission should have the right, if found to be as complained of, to substitute in lieu thereof a reasonable and just classification of the article or articles complained of.

I offered an amendment to the Hepburn railroad-rate bill when it was pending in this body, and before its passage, two years ago, and while it was still in the Committee of the Whole House, to cure this evil, the amendment being as follows:

> On page 10, section 4, line 15, after the word "regulations," insert the words "or classifications;" and after the word "regulation," in line 23, insert the words "or classification;" and on page 11, line 5, after the word "regulation," insert the words "or classification."

It was voted down by Democrats and Republicans alike.

This amendment would have invested the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power over this very subject of classification, and would have been a limit and a check upon the railroad companies of the country in their rate-raising proclivities by the devious method of change of classification.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the latter of the amendments that I advocate, namely, that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to make a physical valuation of the railroads of the country.

Without this amendment being enacted into law the Interstate Commerce Commission is powerless, almost, in legal conflicts with the railroads of the country to sustain themselves when the justness and reasonableness of their rates are called into question in the courts.

Mr. Chairman, I had the honor to hold the office of attorney-general in my State for fourteen years. In that long time I had many conflicts in the courts as attorney-general with the railroads in the State of Florida. These legal contentions grew out of resistance on the part of the railroads in the State of Florida to the rates prescribed by its state railroad commission. Wherever the railroads challenged the justness and reasonableness of the state commission's prescribed rate, or rates, their one plea that they relied upon was that the particular rate so prescribed by the state railroad commission, or that the whole series of rates prescribed by the state railroad commission, in effect, were confiscatory, and so diminished the profits of the company in operating its railroad as not to permit the company to make a reasonable profit upon its investment. Some of this litigation, or at least litigation of a similar character, is pending to-day in the courts in the State of Florida. One suit is between the Pensacola and Atlantic division of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad and the State of Florida, through its state railroad commission. To support the contention of the railroad company, and to support its plea, my information is that the company has placed in evidence in the litigation the entire physical cost and value of its railway lines within the State of Florida. That is my information.

In other words, the railroad has physically valued, by its own selected engineers and officers, its railroad depots, terminals, section houses, its roadbed, rails, rights of way, and every appurtenance to the railroad, and placed this value in evidence in the pending lawsuit to show what its investment is, and in this way raises the issue that the state commission's rate or rates is or are confiscatory and will not permit a reasonable earning upon its investment. And under the laws of Florida the railroad commission have employed an engineer and will make, in their own behalf, their valuation of the physical property of this contending and litigating railroad.

So, Mr. Chairman, if a conflict should come, as it will come, in the courts of the United States on the part of the Attorney-General of the United States and his assistants, or of special counsel employed by the Federal Government, to enforce any rate or series of rates prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission for any railroad, their first plea in such courts would be that their investment was so large and their physical property so great in value that such rate or rates, in their operation, would not permit the railroad company to earn a reasonable compensation upon its investment. This kind of physical valuation is an essential part of the Interstate Commerce Commission's power to sustain in court the justness and reasonableness of the rates they prescribe for the railroads. Unless they have this physical valuation of the properties of the railroad companies, then when they are met by the pleas in the Federal courts of the railroad attorneys and of the railroads, that their rates are unjust and unreasonable and are confiscatory in their nature and in their effect, the commission and its attorneys and the Federal Government will be powerless to sustain their contentions that their rates are just and reasonable.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said by high authority that all men are liars. Certainly if there is an inclination in the human heart to falsify, unfortunately there is no temptation so great to perjury as the love of money.

In the great contentions that will come between the Federal Government and the railroads over the enforcement of the rates prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission there will be some mighty swearing on the part of some railway officials. The temptation to sustain their unjust and unreasonable rates and to sustain and hold the millions of dollars that they get by operating unjust and unreasonable rates must necessarily lead to some false swearing in the courts upon the question of the valuation of railway properties and kindred questions.

A remarkable case of contradictory oaths as to railway value has occurred in the State of Florida. I give the facts which were furnished and read in the United States Senate a few years ago and were embodied in the speech of one of its very able Senators. These facts were given to the Senator by a lawyer in Florida, who I know is familiar with the railway litigation in that State, as against the state railroad commission, and who I believe has stated the facts with literal exactness. I quote the letter of the Florida lawyer to the United States Senator, which was read, in part, on the floor of the Senate at that time, to wit:

> The Florida railroad commission enforces its orders by mandamus instituted originally in the supreme court of the State, and yet Judge Pardee has enjoined the Florida railroad commission and all of the state officials from instituting suit in the supreme court of the State by mandamus to compel the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company to reduce its passenger fare from 4 cents to 3 cents per mile in Florida, and this injunction was granted upon the affidavit of the vice-president of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad to the effect that the Louisville and Nashville property in Florida is worth at least $5,200,000—this high valuation being essential to their case—and the State produced an affidavit made by the same man one month and twenty-eight days prior to his swearing to the bill, in which affidavit he had sworn that the identical property was not worth exceeding $1,700,000; and yet in this man's affidavit the State was temporarily restrained from instituting mandamus proceedings in the supreme court of Florida to enforce compliance with the rate.

Mr. Chairman, here was a case where a vice-president of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad swore that for the purposes of taxation the property of that railroad in Florida was worth $300,000 less than $2,000,000. In a short time afterwards this same vice-president swore that this same identical property was worth $5,200,000, and this latter high valuation was essential to sustain the contention of the railroad in the courts. Upon this latter affidavit a facile federal judge restrained the state officials from instituting mandamus proceedings in its supreme court to enforce compliance with the prescribed rates of the state railroad commission. And this scandalous case will be repeated a thousand times in the federal courts of this country when the Attorney-General of the United States and his assistants and special federal counsel come in conflict with the interstate railroads to enforce the rates prescribed for them by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

For the Congress not to pass such an amendment as I here advocate is to leave their constituents—the shippers, the producers, and the consumers—bound hand and foot to the onerous executions of excessive railroad transportation charges.

Suits are pending now in the federal courts contesting the rates prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and challenging the constitutionality of the legislation under which these rates are fixed, and the pleas will be heard in every United States court where this litigation is pending by the railroad lawyers for their railroad clients that the rates prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission are confiscatory in effect and deprive the railroad company of a fair remuneration upon their investment.

And, Mr. Chairman, the question will occur to the Government's counsel, "What is the real, bona fide value of the railroad investment?" And unless they are possessed of the means of fixing before the courts of the land with exactness the real value of the physical property of the railroads, they will be overwhelmed by the railroads, with their bloated, ballooned, fraudulent valuations of their property. The Attorney-General of the United States, able though he is, and his assistants and special counsel, however ingenious and learned they may be, will be embarrassed and nonplussed and humiliated and defeated in the courts of the country unless they can go into those courts armed with the evidence of value of the railroads that should be placed in their hands by the Congress of the United States.

The vast majority of 80,000,000 people will hold the Congress of the United States to a vigorous accounting. At least, it should be done unless the Congress of the United States will pass such legislation as will put the shippers of the country, the producers, and the consumers on a level in the courts with the railroads of the country.

Mr. Chairman, when the people of the United States fully understand this question and thoroughly understand how defenseless they are at present in their conflicts with the railroads, through their own legal agents, in their own courts, there will be an aroused, a wrathful public sentiment, the shock of which the Congress must meet.

Mr. Chairman, the railroads of the United States, with their fourteen billions of apparent property, with their multiplied resources in capable lawyers, with their purchased newspaper press, and with their attorneys and agents holding high governmental positions, are a great and a powerful force to contend against. But there is a greater force than the railroad corporations and all their allied and sympathetic corporate interests. The people of the United States intelligently aroused upon this great question are more powerful than the railroads and their allies. In such a contest, when it is fully on, there can be but one end. This legislation will finally be passed by the American Congress. When the people of the United States cease to look upon railroads as the private property of their owners, when they learn and fully and completely understand the fact that the people of the United States and of the States can own every line of railroad by condemnation and purchase, and take over from the railroads their property and make it the property of the people, then this matter will be nearer settlement than it is now.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to government ownership. But I wonder sometimes whether this great railroad problem will ever be settled otherwise than by full government ownership, or at least by the purchase in the leading lines of the country of a controlling interest by the state and national governments. It is at least instructive upon this phase of the question to recall that most of the European nations own their railroads; that Japan in recent years, by enormous national bond issues, has taken over to itself nearly all of its lines of railroad. That Mexico, wise in its generation, anticipating some rheumatic visit of Mr. E. H. Harriman, has already purchased, to forestall his hospitality, a controlling government interest in its main lines of railway.

William J. Bryan has already publicly declared his opinion, that this great problem will never be settled except by government ownership, and thousands of intelligent men besides Mr. Bryan, looking with apprehension upon the great power of the railroads of the country, and seeing how impossible, almost, it is for government attorneys and government boards to fully control and regulate them, share the same opinion with Mr. Bryan.

Mr. Chairman, let me point out the vast power of the railroads of the country in their wealth, and the vast power of a few men controlling this wealth. In a speech I delivered on the floor of this House on February 8, 1907, I used this language and made the following quotations:

The railway capitalization in the United States is something over $13,000,000,000, and the railway mileage in the United States is about 220,000 miles. Six groups of men own 164,000 miles out of this total mileage of 220,000 miles. Let me read the groups. There is the Vanderbilt group, the Pennsylvania group, the Morgan-Hill group, the Gould-Rockefeller group, the Harriman group, the Moore group, and the Santa Fe. Out of this total mileage of 220,000 miles, I repeat, they own 164,000 miles, and out of the total capitalization of over thirteen billions they own nine billions and more. In 1898 Mr. Hobson, one of the greatest of English economists, wrote in his "Evolution of Modern Capitalism:"

"The rapidity with which the whole railway system is passing into the hands of great monopolist syndicates, with the necessary result of stifling competition, is in some respects the most momentous economic movement in the United States at the present time."

Moody on Trusts, an authoritative work upon that subject, on page 491, declares as follows:

The Standard influence is felt—

Meaning thereby the Standard Oil Company—

quite forcefully in all the railroad groups, and this influence is showing a steady growth throughout the entire steam railroad field. It is now freely predicted in Wall street that the next decade will see the Rockefeller interests the single dominating force in the world of railway finance and control.

In a book I have in my hand designated "Railways, Trusts, and the People," by Prof. Frank Parsons, an authority upon these matters, he states as follows, on page 13:

Whatever may be the true number of our railroad kings, it is beyond question that a very few men have power to control our railway rates, and that still fewer will control them if the present processes of consolidation and combination continue. The managers of six big systems control three-fourths of the country and five-sixths of the traffic and indirectly dominate almost all the rest. The six big groups are growing into one. The railway empire looms huge and powerful out of the mists that shroud the future.

In the conclusion of the chapter devoted to the subject of the "railway empire" he uses this language:

The motives that impel men to build these giant combines by consolidation or coordination relate partly to the economies and transportation benefits of union, and partly to the personal profit and power of those who control the combines. The first motive and its consequences are in line with the public good. In so far as combination eliminates the wastes of conflict and secures the benefits of harmonious cooperation in the railway service, it is a gain to the community. But in so far as it conduces to the financial ascendency of Wall street and intensifies the commercial supremacy and industrial dominion of a few great capitalists, it is a political, industrial, and social danger. The railways united form a much more extensive interest than the Government from an economic point of view. Already they outrank our state governments and dominate the political affairs of sovereign commonwealths, and as a unit in the hands of a gigantic trust, they might even overshadow and control the National Government itself.

And, Mr. Chairman, out of this vast capitalization of over $13,000,000,000 and, at present, 227,000 miles of railroad there are high authorities in this country who hold that 50 per cent at least of this vast capitalization is an unparalleled fraud.

I quote the opinion of Professor Parsons, a competent authority on this matter, who testified before the Industrial Commission many years ago as follows:

The prevalence of water in the railroad system is so well known that it is not necessary to do more than touch upon the matter. Vanderbilt set the pace in consolidating the 11 roads between Albany and Buffalo, and increased the capitalization by nearly $9,000,000 in doing it; then added 50 per cent to the stock capitalization of the Hudson road, of which he was president; then extending his control over the Central and adopting the same tactics there, he added 80 per cent to the New York Central; then he consolidated the two roads, and in doing it inflated the Central 27 per cent more and the Hudson 85 per cent; so that in the four years from 1866 to 1870 he brought the capitalization up from $54,000,000, which was a little more than the total cost on the books of the company—about $4,000,000 more—to $103,000,000. The total cost on the books in 1870 was under $70,000 per mile, while under his capitalization it was $122,000 per mile.

That example has been followed to a great extent all over the country, so that our railroad capitalization is now about half water or water and wind. The figures of construction and equipment cost given in Poor's Manual from time to time indicate that the railroads of the United States are capitalized at about double what they could be built and equipped for at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, the practices prevalent at the time that Professor Parsons speaks of, years ago, have been practiced in more recent times. Not in one instance, but in hundreds, and in every case this fraudulent overcapitalization is charged up against the American producers, consumers, and shippers as a perpetual indebtedness.

Hon. Joseph L. Bristow, lately elected to be a United States Senator from Kansas, addressed its legislature in a prepared speech. In his speech he made the following statements:

E. H. Harriman, Mortimer L. Schiff, George J. Gould, and James Stillman acquired control of the Alton Railroad, paying in round numbers, it has been alleged, $39,000,000 for 98 per cent of its stock. It had an outstanding indebtedness of bonds and stocks amounting, I am informed, to $33,000,000. These men retained control of the property for about seven years, during which this indebtedness was advanced by them from $33,000,000 to $114,000,000, making a net increase of about $81,000,000. Of this gigantic sum there was expended in improvements and additions about $18,000,000, leaving an increase in the indebtedness of the railroad of more than $62,000,000, or more than $66,000 per mile, for which the company received nothing whatever. The proceeds from the sale of this $62,000,000 of increased indebtedness was appropriated to the personal use of the syndicate, and the methods by which the property was loaded with this debt, and its revenues looted, is very interesting.

The laws of our country should regard the financial methods employed in the Alton case as criminal, and the men guilty of such high-handed operations should face imprisonment. Yet to-day these captains of high finance are making a determined effort to prevent the enactment of legislation that will take from them their opportunities for plunder, and to do this they buy or subsidize newspapers, employ able attorneys to look after their political interests, and by false representation try to organize their employees into political associations that will be obedient to their demands.

They seek to destroy every man in public life who is not subservient to their wishes. They are especially interested in the control of the United States Senate and the federal judiciary; probably more interested in the Senate, because through it they have frequently been able to control the selection of federal judges.

It is my purpose to use what talents I may have to bring about legislation that will establish the same rules of justice for these financial banditti that applies to the conduct of men in ordinary walks of life. It should be just as easy to send a man to prison who loots a railroad of $10,000,000 or $50,000,000 as it is the man who burglarizes a bank or robs a post-office.

It can not be doubted, Mr. Chairman, that as soon as the American people intelligently comprehend this railroad problem in relation to them and their rights they will instruct, in language not to be doubted, their agents in the American Congress to carry out their wishes.

I will introduce a bill embracing the three amendments that I have advocated, and also the power to permit, or prohibit, future bond and stock issues of interstate railroads.

If the railroads are permitted to increase fraudulently, at will, their indebtedness, then they can raise rates at will to pay interest on this indebtedness.

And that is exactly what the railroads are doing and have done. Mr. Chairman, this state of affairs makes the American people look stupid, in that they daily permit it.

What has been the history, briefly, of railroad rate legislation on the part of the National Government? In 1886 the first legislation was had upon this subject in the Congress of the United States. The Interstate Commerce Commission was created. It was thought by the public, and the commission themselves held, that they possessed the rate-making power. In 1897, ten years afterwards, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Interstate Commerce Commission did not have the rate-making power. This made the Interstate Commerce Commission a mere shadow of what it thought it had been. They became a board of highly respectable and highly respected public citizens, with a title and without power. Were it not for their high character, their high integrity, and the respect in which they were held by good men, they would have been the contempt and laughingstock of the country. The railroads did laugh at them, and held them in legal contempt, because they were powerless to enforce a just and reasonable rate upon the railroads. The Interstate Commerce Commission were then the laughingstock and the butt of jokes by the railroad-owned press in the United States. The Congress of the United States, if it did not treat them with contempt, treated them with absolute and perfect indifference. Their annual reports were laid upon the desks of Members of the Congress. They might have been opened, they might possibly have been read, but they were never heeded. And in these reports from 1897 until 1905 they urged upon the Congress of the United States the importance of giving to them the power to prescribe a just and reasonable rate on the complaint of the shipper. This was the one and substantial power that they asked for, but in addition to this, in their annual reports for years, they plead and almost begged of Congress that they confer upon them other and subsidiary powers, important in themselves, that they might restrain the railroad companies and the private car lines from their vicious and unjust practices.

Mr. Chairman, these reports might as well have been addressed to and laid at the feet of the Egyptian sphinx. Congress was blind, dumb, and deaf.

I declared on the floor of this House three or four years ago, in discussing the bills then pending before the House and discussing the President's message, that I did not believe that the House of Representatives, as then constituted, would for many years to come have considered and passed any railroad rate legislation unless Theodore Roosevelt had thrown his message to the Fifty-eighth Congress, recommending certain powers to be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon the floor of the House of Representatives like a bomb and compelled their attention to it. That language was correct then, I believe, and I have never thought yet that I made any mistake in making it. The President in his message to the Fifty-eighth Congress recommended four substantial powers to be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission:

First. That they should have the rate-making power upon complaint of the shipper.

Second. That the terminal lines of the country should be put under the authority of law that their iniquitous impositions upon the traffic of the country might be corrected.

Third. Recommendation was made that the private car lines owned by the packers' trust in Chicago, the beef trust, as it is popularly called, be placed under the authority of law, that their excessive icing charges might be remedied.

He further, and fourthly, recommended that railroads and steamships with connecting freight rates and not operated in common should be placed under the authority of law.

Mr. Chairman, how did both political parties in this body meet that message? The Democratic caucus met shortly afterwards, and its sole provision, embodied in its caucus bill, was the first recommendation of the President to the Congress. The Republican caucus met shortly after that, and its bill embodied the Democratic recommendation, plus some regulation of joint rates of railroads, and further provided for a special court of the expediting of litigation growing out of this national legislation.

But neither political party in this body in the Fifty-eighth Congress and following the President's message put nearly so much of relief for the shippers of the country into their respective caucus bills as was embodied in his message by the President of the United States. And the astounding spectacle was presented to the country that, after the adjournment of the Democratic caucus, Theodore Roosevelt, a Republican President, could go into every State represented by a Democratic Senator and into every district represented by a Democratic Member of this House and show to the producers and the consumers and shippers in those districts and in those States that he had recommended more to their benefit in his annual message than their Democratic Representatives had incorporated in their caucus bill.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard it said by men in this country, not a thousand miles removed from this Capitol, that Roosevelt had bewitched the people of this country. I am a Democrat, and that constitutes quite a number of differences with the President at once. But, Mr. Chairman, undoubtedly his great reputation among his countrymen is grounded not in the bewitchment of the people, but in their knowledge of the great services that he rendered to his countrymen in initiating his great contest for reform legislation with reference to the public-service corporations; and the fact that his recommendations at that time were far and beyond the acts of the two political parties in this body in railroad rate legislation accounts for his strength with those producers, and with those consumers, and with those shippers.

Mr. Chairman, when will this further remedial legislation come, on the part of Congress, against the interstate railroads of this country? How long will it be? There is one way in which it can come, Mr. Chairman, more quickly than in any other way. The Democratic minority in the Senate of the United States and in this House of Representatives can compel the enactment of this remedial legislation. Were they to meet in caucus to-night and adopt a full and complete remedial railroad rate bill, it would be impossible for the Republicans in the Senate and in this House of Representatives to long delay passing it. It is the function of the minority to compel the majority to legislate beneficially when that majority is recusant and refuses to do so. But what can be said of a minority that does not act? What hope, Mr. Chairman—and I address my remarks particularly to my Democratic colleagues—what hope is there for Democracy in this great country unless they can show to the people of the country that they are more entitled to come here to the Senate and the House as a majority than are the Republicans? There is no reason or right in converting a minority into a majority unless the minority deserves such promotion.

It is undoubtedly true, and I prophesy, that the Republicans in the Congress, unless stirred to action by the President-elect, William H. Taft, will not enact further and real remedial railroad rate legislation in ten or, perhaps, twenty years. What then, Mr. Chairman, will be the attitude of my party in Congress upon this great question?

The last Democratic national convention declared as follows upon this question:

RAILROAD REGULATION.

We assert the right of Congress to exercise complete control over interstate commerce and the right of each State to exercise like control over commerce within its borders.

We demand such enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission as may be necessary to compel railroads to perform their duties as common carriers and prevent discrimination and extortion.

We favor the efficient supervision and rate regulation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce; to this end we recommend the valuation of railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission, such valuation to take into consideration the physical value of the property, the original cost and cost of reproduction, and all elements of value that will render the valuation made fair and just.

We favor such legislation as will prohibit the railroads from engaging in business which brings them into competition with their shippers; also legislation which will assure such reducton in transportation rates as conditions will permit, care being taken to avoid reductions that would compel a reduction of wages, prevent adequate service, or do injustice to legitimate investments. We heartily approve the laws prohibiting the pass and the rebate, and we favor any further necessary legislation to restrain, control, and prevent such abuses.

We favor such legislation as will increase the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission, giving to it the initiative wth reference to rates and transportation charges put into effect by the railroad companies, and permitting the Interstate Commerce Commission, on its own initiative, to declare a rate illegal and as being more than should be charged for such service. The present law relating thereto is inadequate by reason of the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission is without power to fix or investigate a rate until complaint has been made to it by the shipper.

We further declare that all agreements of traffic or other associations of railway agents affecting interstate rates, service, or classification shall be unlawful unless filed with and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

We favor the enactment of a law giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to inspect proposed railroad tariff rates or schedules before they shall take effect, and, if they be found to be unreasonable, to initiate an adjustment thereof.

Will the Democrats, unitedly and collectively, and by caucus and by their authoritative means of convincing the country, compel the Republican majority in Congress to action upon this question? If the Democrats are so conservative in Congress and so little radical that they can not or will not act upon this question, and will not follow out legislatively and in party caucus the declarations of the national convention, then they can look for the same result at the polls four years from now that they have gotten for the past twelve, and almost fifty, years.

At the coming special session of Congress the tariff question will be disposed of. Let no Democrat rest securely in the hope that the Republican party will go to pieces in making a substitute bill for the Dingley bill. Let not the Democrats of the House and Senate and of the country put their confidence in defeating the Republican party by waiting until the country is tired of Republicanism. Such a negative position will not win. The people of this country will tolerate some extravagance in a political party. They will stand for some high-handed measures at times, but there is one thing that they will not endure. That political party that shows that it is without initiative, without courage, and without competency has lost its battle before it gets even to the firing line. For the Democrats to be Bryanites at national conventions and Parkerites in congressional committees, unless all signs fail, four years from now will make another case of "beaten to a frazzle."

Mr. Chairman, I come from a county that bears the name of Jefferson, and believes in his ideas of democracy. First and foremost above all is the doctrine of "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." Undoubtedly this last part of the phrase, "special privileges to none," is the foundation of the corporation question in the United States.

Confining my remarks to the railroad companies, under the power of rate making and rate changing and overcapitalization, I assert that they possess the taxing power over the transportation of products in the United States to the very point of confiscation. They can tax the shipment of the products of the land so high that every particle of profit in the shipment is lost to the shipper. If they can consume and devour the profits of the land, then the people are the mere tenants of the railroad companies, and the people might as well give the railroads the lands along with the profits.

The State I come from, Mr. Chairman, is Democratic, and will remain so. They want to see this great railway rate reform worked out by the national Democratic party. They would like to see a Democratic President in the White House recommending the very things upon this question that were contained in the last national Democratic platform. They would like to see Democratic Representatives in this House and the Democratic Senators lead in the discussion of this question and force the contest upon the Republicans and compel them to legislate upon this question remedially or be defeated at the polls in their respective States.

But the shippers and the producers and the consumers in Florida would like to see the Republicans carry out this great reform if the Democrats of the country find themselves unable or unwilling to do so.

In a speech lately made by President-elect Taft, he used this language:

> The legislation affecting the great railway and industrial corporations needs amendment, not so much to change its principles or objects as to facilitate its enforcement and make its violation less easy and advisable.

When the tariff question is settled at the coming session of the Sixty-first Congress, if President Taft then addresses himself to the full and complete settlement of this great railway and industrial question of full and complete regulation by the National Government, and he is permitted by the Democrats in Congress to receive the larger share of praise and commendation for his labors, then no fault need be found by them if, four years from now, the American electorate should say to the present President-elect, "Good and faithful servant, come up to the Presidency once more."

In the Fifty-eighth Congress I voted in caucus for the Democratic caucus bill to regulate railway rates, joined with the Democrats on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee in reporting said bill with amendments to this House, and in the House voted for the bill, so amended, as a substitute for the Republican Esch-Townsend bill.

But I also joined with Hon. DORSEY W. SHACKLEFORD, from Missouri, a member of that committee, in formally reporting from said committee a more remedial railroad rate bill, as indicating the extent that we would go if we could have done so. Its provisions are briefly set out in that report, as follows:

VIEWS OF MESSRS. SHACKLEFORD AND LAMAR.

It is with great reluctance that we dissent from the expressed views of other members of the committee. The overshadowing importance of the subject, however, demands that we shall put forth every possible effort to secure for the people the full measure of relief which they demand and to which they are entitled. It has been urged that it were better to accept at this time partial remedies for the evils complained of and trust to the future legislation for complete relief. We think this would be a most grievous error. This suggestion might have force if we, as representatives of the people, could at any time bring up for consideration proposed legislation. We all know this can not be done under the rules of the House as at present administered. Now, after decades of waiting, under the stress of an intense public sentiment and the pressure of a strenuous Executive, we are permitted to legislate upon this great question. What shall we do with our opportunity? Should we not go boldly into a full consideration of the whole subject? If we do less, will the people excuse us?

Any legislation at this time will fall far short of the work unless it shall provide:

1. Power to find a given rate unreasonable or unjust and to prescribe a reasonable or just rate to be substituted.
2. Power to prescribe a joint rate.
3. Power to eliminate unjust discrimination.
4. Power to stop rebates and secret cut rates.
5. Power to regulate private cars and private car lines.
6. Power to regulate terminals and terminal facilities.
7. Power to regulate freight classifications.
8. Power to compel the furnishing of equal facilities to all.
9. The preservation of competition between carriers and markets and a limitation upon the power of the commission to raise rates or prescribe minimum rates.
10. For facilitating a speedy conclusion of proceedings in courts and limiting litigation as far as the same may be done.

With a view to securing these remedies we herewith submit a substitute bill which we think amply meets the demands. The basis of the substitute we offer is the Hearst bill. It contains all of the provisions of the Davey bill, but it also goes much further in what we regard as required remedial legislation.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

D. W. SHACKLEFORD.
W. B. LAMAR.

In February, 1904, a Member of this House from New York [Mr. Hearst] introduced a bill to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This was six or seven months prior to the remarkable message of President Roosevelt to the Fifty-eighth Congress upon the same subject. But Mr. Hearst's bill was far more remedial than the President's message.

The Hearst bill prohibited the infamous "midnight rate." It put the private refrigerator car lines of the beef packers, "the beef trust," under the control of law, to prevent their excessive icing charges.

It gave to the Interstate Commerce Commission power over the classification of railroad rates. It prohibited an increase of a railroad rate without the consent of the commission first being had.

None of these powers were, in the Fifty-eighth Congress, contained either in the Democratic caucus bill or in the Republican caucus bill. I have always believed that had the Democrats in the Fifty-eighth Congress made the "Hearst bill," or its provisions, their caucus bill, and compelled the Republicans to vote it down, as they would have done, that then the House of Representatives in the Fifty-ninth Congress would have contained a Democratic majority. The Democratic party can not win the country with an attitude on this great question as poor as that of Republican Representatives, and not half as good as that of a Republican President.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, one day in the month of December, 1908, somebody was kind enough to mail me a pamphlet containing the speech of Mr. William C. Brown, the president of the New York Central system, delivered at the eleventh annual meeting of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association in Chicago, December 8, 1908.

In this speech Mr. Brown was endeavoring to show the necessity for an advance in railroad freight rates throughout the country. I became interested in his discussion of the question. I was curious to know whether the railroads really needed additional freight rates to enable them to continue to pay dividends.

Among other things, Mr. Brown said:

> In mileage the railroads of the United States approximate 225,000 miles. They employed in 1907 in the neighborhood of 1,675,000 men, and their gross earnings amounted to $2,585,913,000, or more than $7,000,000 for each of the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year. Figures of this magnitude can be better comprehended by comparison, and it may be stated that the number of employees on the pay rolls of American railroads in 1907 was only about 80,000 less than the standing armies of the United States, Great Britain, Germany, France, and Japan combined. Their gross earnings were three times the total revenue of the United States Government, twenty-nine times the total gold production of the United States, and six times the total gold production of the world.

Mr. Brown's statement excited my curiosity, and being anxious to do justice to the great interests involved I set about a study of the question. I was anxious to agree with Mr. Brown, for I believed that a statement such as he made, involving as it did the life and death of the great properties, was worthy of the greatest consideration.

To enable me to study the question intelligently I introduced a resolution calling on the Interstate Commerce Commission to furnish information showing increases in freight rates since the enactment of the Hepburn law.

The report which was received from the Interstate Commerce Commission showed a large number of increases in freight rates, but the report, which follows, was so unsatisfactory that I decided to make a further study of the question on my own account.

[House Document No. 1412, Sixtieth Congress, second session.]

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, February 4, 1909.

To the House of Representatives:

On January 15 the House of Representatives adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be required to inform the House, as soon as may be, what advances have occurred in freight rates in different parts of the United States since the passage of the Hepburn amendment, June 29, 1906; whether such advances have been occasioned by an advance in the tariff rate or by a change in classification or by charging for some privilege which was formerly accorded free."

In response thereto the Interstate Commerce Commission has the honor to report:

Between July 1, 1906, and January 15, 1909, nearly 600,000 schedules of rates and classifications and supplements thereto, varying in size from 1 page to 700 pages, were filed with this commission. No record has been kept of the number of pages contained in schedules as they were filed. Such record has now been kept for one week, and it is found that the schedules and supplements average 5 pages each. This is believed to be a fair average for the period above mentioned, and based thereon it is seen that the schedules filed within that period contained approximately 3,000,000 pages. The number of rate items is conservatively estimated to be about 50 per page, and in order to determine accurately what advances have been effected by such schedules it would be necessary to examine and compare 150,000,000 rate items, with a like number of items filed previous to July 1, 1906.

This estimate does not take into account changes which have been effected in the absence of through joint rates by changes in proportional rates, basing rates, or local rates which are used in the absence of joint through rates for making through rates in combination with other similar rates. For example, a single-page schedule naming proportional rates from New York and other Atlantic seaboard cities to Chicago, Peoria, East St. Louis, and other Mississippi River crossings and applicable to traffic destined to points west of the Mississippi River, if changed, would affect through rates to thousands of destinations west of the Mississippi River. In instances of this kind—and they are numerous—the present rates would have to be determined by combining the proportional rates east of the base points with the local rates west thereof, and before comparison could be made former rates would have to be made up in like manner.

A schedule of 90 pages recently filed contains specific rates on 3,800 separate articles. There are two ratings—one applicable to carload quantities and one to less than carload quantities—for most of these articles. The rates apply from 10 groups of origin, embracing a large number of the States east of the Mississippi River. This schedule contains approximately 60,000 separate specific rates, and in order to determine what changes are effected thereby comparison would have to be made with a like number of items published in previous schedules. This schedule was not of exceptional size, as many schedules contain between 200 and 700 pages.

On a previous occasion the schedules filed upon a single day were examined and compared with corresponding rates previously on file. Eight rate clerks were engaged upon this work for a period of seven days, and were unable within that time to complete the check of the single day's filing. The number of schedules filed on that day was considerably below the average daily filing. The number of pages so examined did not exceed 2,000, while the present average number of pages filed per day is about 3,800.

It will therefore be seen that it is impossible, with the present force, to undertake such check of rates as would be necessary in order to secure in complete form the information requested, and that even if a very large number of additional clerks were employed for that purpose it would probably be a work of several years. Experienced rate clerks would be essential to intelligent work in that line, and even if they were available, which they are not, so many changes would be effected in rates during the time within which statement was being prepared that it would not accurately represent conditions at the time of its completion.

Many important advances in rates have been made since the passage of the Hepburn amendment. We have not been able to keep a record of the advances, but in a general way the following are noted:

The different freight-association territories hereinafter referred to are, in a general way, defined as follows:

Central Freight Association territory is that territory lying west of Buffalo and Pittsburg, north of the Ohio River, and east of Chicago and St. Louis.

Southeastern Freight Association territory is that territory lying south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi rivers.

Trunk Line territory is that territory lying north of the Ohio River, east of Buffalo and Pittsburg, and west of the Hudson River.

Trans-Continental rates apply between points on the Pacific coast and points east of the Missouri and Mississippi rivers. Under these rates it is common to blanket a large territory on the east. For example, many of these rates apply alike from or to all points east of Chicago and north of the Ohio River.

Official classification territory includes all the territory east of Chicago and St. Louis and north of the Ohio River.

Southern classification territory includes the territory south and east of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers.

Western classification territory includes all the territory west of the official and southern classification territories.

COAL.

Rates have been advanced 5 cents per ton from the Pennsylvania, Maryland, and West Virginia fields to Central Freight Association territory and from the Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama fields to points in Southeastern Freight Association territory.

PIG IRON.

Rates have been advanced 25 cents per ton from furnace points in Southeastern Freight Association territory to points in Central Freight Association and Trunk Line territories.

CAST-IRON PIPE.

Rates have been advanced 25 cents per ton from foundry points in Southeastern Freight Association territory to points in Central Freight Association and Trunk Line territories.

IRON AND STEEL ARTICLES.

Rates subject to official classification have been generally advanced by the withdrawal of commodity rates and the application in lieu thereof of higher class rates. These advances are not uniform to all points affected.

LUMBER.

Rates from Chicago and points basing thereon to Trunk Line territory have been generally advanced by withdrawal of commodity rates and the application in lieu thereof of higher class rates. This advance was not uniform as to all points affected.

Rates from producing points in the Pacific Northwest to all destinations were advanced on November 1, 1907. After full hearing on complaint this commission condemned the advance made from the producing points to points lying west of a line drawn from Pembina, N. Dak., through Omaha and Kansas City to Port Arthur, Tex. An increase of 5 cents per 100 pounds was permitted to points lying east of that line.

GRAIN AND GRAIN PRODUCTS.

Rates have been advanced 2 cents per 100 pounds from Ohio and Mississippi River crossings to Southeastern Freight Association territory. Rates from northern and western producing points are based upon the Ohio and Mississippi River crossing rates, and therefore this advance resulted in an advance from all that territory.

Rates were advanced 2 cents per 100 pounds from Chicago to New York in May, 1907. The proportional rate applicable from Chicago on shipments from points west of the Mississippi River was reduced 1½ cents per 100 pounds on wheat and corn and one-half cent per 100 pounds on rye, oats, and barley in May, 1908.

Rates from the Missouri River to the Mississippi River crossings and to Chicago were increased 1½ cents per 100 pounds in July, 1907.

PACKING-HOUSE PRODUCTS.

Rates have been advanced 3 cents per 100 pounds from Ohio and Mississippi River crossings to Southeastern Freight Association territory. Rates from northern and western producing points are based upon the Ohio and Mississippi River rates, and therefore corresponding advances result in rates from those producing points.

SUGAR.

Rates have been advanced 2 cents per 100 pounds from New York and New Orleans and from points in Trunk Line territory, rates from which are made with relation to the New York rates to points in Central Freight Association territory, and to Chicago and to St. Paul and to points in the northwest, the rates to which are made with relation to the Chicago or St. Paul rates.

TO TEXAS POINTS.

Rates have been advanced from Kansas City and St. Louis and points basing thereon, which embraces the entire territory east of the Mississippi River and a large number of points west thereof, to Texas points in sums ranging from 4 cents per 100 pounds on one class or article to 10 cents per 100 pounds on another class or article.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RATES.

These rates have been advanced both eastbound and westbound between points in the Atlantic seaboard territory and States east of the Mississippi River, on the one hand, and terminal points on the Pacific coast and intermediate points, the rates to which are made with relation thereto, on the other hand, in sums ranging from 3 per cent on one article to 60 per cent on another article. The heaviest advance was in eastbound rates.

CLASSIFICATIONS.

Many advances in rates have been effected by changes in classification ratings and without changes in the specific scale of rates. Many changes in required carload minimum weights have been made. These do not necessarily increase the rates upon the commodities to which they apply unless the minimum weight has been fixed so high as to make it impossible to load it into the car.

OTHER CHANGES.

The tariffs of to-day contain many listed charges for services which would not be found in the tariffs in effect immediately prior to the Hepburn amendment. They, however, can not be said to be additional or increased charges, because now the tariffs contain lawful authority and provision for many services and charges which formerly were rendered without specific tariff authority therefor. The tariffs now contain many provisions for assessment and absorption of switching charges which simply continue former practices for which provision was not made in the tariffs. The same is no doubt true as to many transit privileges.

EXPRESS RATES.

Express companies were first brought under the act to regulate commerce by the Hepburn amendment, and this necessitated an entire reconstruction of their rate schedules. None were on file with the commission prior to that time. No general advances in the charges of express companies have been noted except between various points in New England territory, where advances have been made ranging from 10 cents to 25 cents per 100 pounds.

PASSENGER FARES.

There have been no general increases in passenger fares; the tendency has been in the opposite direction. Reductions in state fares have resulted in a general lowering of interstate passenger fares.

The general increases in rates to Southeastern Freight Association territory and the increase in the rates to southwestern territory have been made the subject of complaint to this commission, and these complaints are in course of investigation, several hearings on same having been had.

As stated in our annual report recently submitted to the Congress, the commission, on April 15, 1908, promulgated a ruling that tariffs applying on traffic exported to or imported from foreign countries not adjacent to the United States must, in accordance with the requirements of the law, show the rates, fares, and charges of the inland carriers subject to the act for the transportation in the United States to the port and from the port.

Rather than to conform to this requirement the rail carriers in the United States ordinarily known as the "transcontinental lines" withdrew, effective November 1, 1908, all their through import and export rates via the Pacific ports, leaving their domestic rates to and from the ports to apply to the inland carriage of such export and import traffic.

Presumably this resulted in increased rates upon such traffic as has been subsequently imported or exported through those ports, but we have no means of measuring the advance, as the tariffs did not disclose, and we were not informed, how the former rates were divided between the rail carriers in this country and the ocean steamship lines, and we have no means of knowing now what are the charges of the steamship lines.

Very respectfully, MARTIN A. KNAPP, Chairman.

It was not my purpose in instituting this study of the railroad question to do any injustice to anyone engaged in it, nor to the railroad business, as such. On the contrary, I believed that I would discover reasons why freight rates should be advanced, in order that the properties might continue to enjoy the prosperity with which they have been favored in the past.

My study of the question amazed me. It developed a state of things that I had never before dreamed about. Let me give you a few of the facts which I have discovered. I think you will be equally astonished.

It is true, as Mr. Brown states, that figures of the magnitude which he quotes can be better comprehended by comparison. I want to bring to your attention a few comparisons that will show the gentlemen of this House that the railroad business compared with the other business of the country bears the same relation to the business as a whole that the teaming of an individual house does to the entire business of that firm. Mr. Brown says that the gross earnings of the railroads of the United States amount to more than $7,000,000 a day. Do you know that Chicago pays $1,000,000 a day to the farmers of the United States for cattle? Do you know that these figures of $1,000,000 a day include three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, and do not eliminate the Sundays? You will see there is one industry in one city that does one-seventh as much business in a day as all the railroads in the United States. I can name two firms whose gross receipts are $2,000,000 a day that are located in the Chicago Stock Yards neighborhood. If you will take all the business of "packing town," including the stock yards, you will find that that one locality in one day will do about half as much business in gross earnings as Mr. Brown says all the railroads in the United States do.

Let me bring your attention to some of the business that is done in the district which I have the honor to represent. Did you know that the gross business of the dry goods stores in the First Congressional District of Illinois amounts to $350,000,000 a year and that they employ over 50,000 men and women? That is not so bad a showing for one line of business in one district. There is one dry goods firm in the district from which I come that does almost $100,000,000 a year, and it employs almost as many men in the conduct of its business as the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway employs east of the Missouri River; yet the railroad companies would have you understand that this railroad business should be given precedence, and that those that are engaged in it must receive dividends on their stock, regardless of whether business is good or bad, by raising rates.

IRON AND STEEL RATES.

During the past ten years there have been advances of more than 100 per cent in the rates actually received by the railroads for carrying manufactured iron and steel in carloads between important competitive centers. Ten years ago the printed rates on this commodity were considered so high and unreasonable that the railroads did not attempt to collect them, even from small shippers, on competitive traffic; but the power of the Government has been used to erect these "paper" tariffs into actual legal rates, which the shipper must pay and the railroad must collect under penalty of criminal prosecution.

The following figures show the advances which shippers have been forced to pay:

Freight charges on manufactured iron and steel in carloads between important competitive points in cents per 100 pounds.

	10 years ago.	Present rates.
Pittsburg to Chicago	9	18
Cleveland to Chicago	7	15
Pittsburg to East St. Louis	10	22
Chicago to Missouri River points	10	27
Chicago to Denver	25	77
Chicago to Texas common points	25	75
Chicago to East St. Louis and northern Illinois points	5	8

These figures are fairly representative of the advances which manufacturers and other shippers have had to pay in transportation charges on commodities moving between competitive points.

Coal was formerly carried from West Virginia mines to Chicago for $1.20 per ton, in average cars of 22 tons. The rate is now $1.90 on average cars of 33 tons.

Mr. POLLARD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. POLLARD. I would like to inquire whether those increases apply to all classes of freight or one particular class?

Mr. MADDEN. This has reference to iron and steel products.

Mr. POLLARD. Does the same ratio of increase apply to other commodities?

Mr. MADDEN. In a large measure.

EARNINGS PER MILE OF ROAD.

During the first ten years following the enactment of the interstate-commerce law, while the law remained practically a dead letter, there was no material increase in the earnings of railroads per mile of road. There was a great increase in the mileage in operation, but rates were not advanced, because competition kept them on a fair basis.

During the past ten years, coincident with the rigid enforcement of the law, there has been a great increase in the earnings of railroads, both gross and net, per mile of road.

The following figures are taken from the United States Statistical Abstract for 1907, page 225:

Earnings of railroads per mile of road.

Year.	Gross.	Net.
1888	$6,540	$2,045
1889	6,455	2,068
1890	6,822	2,162
1891	6,852	2,136
1892	6,852	2,068
1893	6,963	2,069
1894	6,054	1,803
1895	6,097	1,804
1896	6,223	1,840
1897	6,228	1,884
1898	6,771	2,111
1899	7,161	2,272
1900	7,826	2,519
1901	8,270	2,668
1902	8,696	2,830
1903	9,301	2,887
1904	9,248	2,989
1905	9,643	3,135
1906	10,631	3,580

INCREASE IN FREIGHT "EARNINGS."

The statistical reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission show the average earnings of railroads per "freight-train mile;" that is, for each average mile traveled by the average freight train. These figures show an average of all the tariffs of the carriers on all commodities, and they are more valuable for comparison than the tariffs on the actual rates received on any one commodity.

During the ten years that followed the enactment of the interstate-commerce law, while the law remained practically a dead letter, there was no increase in this average of earnings from all freight, but in the past ten years there has been a striking advance, as shown in the following table:

Freight earnings per freight train mile.

Interstate Commerce Commission Statistical Report, 1888, p. 20:
1888	$1.65
Interstate Commerce Commission Statistical Report, 1897, p. 82:
1890	1.65
1891	1.63
1892	1.64
1893	1.62
1894	1.55
1895	1.61
1896	1.63
1897	1.65
Interstate Commerce Commission Statistical Report, 1906, p. 103:
1898	1.73
1899	1.79
1900	2.00
1901	2.13
1902	2.27
1903	2.43
1904	2.42
1905	2.49
1906	2.60

Only a small part, a very small part, of this increase since 1897 is due to the larger average capacity of locomotives and cars. The greater part is due to the average increase in rates.

RAILROADS OWNED BY RAILROADS.

The bonds and other securities issued by railroads are based upon and are sustained by the "earnings" rather than the physical property or actual value of the issuing company.

During the past twenty years the "earnings" of the leading railroads have grown so rapidly, chiefly through increases in rates, that enormous issues of bonds and stocks have been made against these "earnings" for the purpose of buying up other railroads.

In 1899 (I. C. C. Stat. Rept., 1906, p. 63) the railroad stocks and bonds owned by railroads amounted to $1,151,972,901. In 1906 these holdings had increased to $2,898,480,829.

Special Report No. 1, "Intercorporate Relationships of Railways" (I. C. C., 1908, compiled as of June 30, 1906), goes more fully into the control by railroads of other railroads.

According to this report (p. 45), the total outstanding issues of stocks by railroads amounted to $8,884,234,925, of which railroad companies owned $4,114,851,990.

Nearly half the stocks issued by railroads are owned by railroads, which also own $1,440,360,507 of the funded debt issued by railroads.

Who will decide what "reasonable" rates a railroad company may charge to pay "reasonable" returns to holders of its stocks or securities, which have been issued for the purpose of acquiring control of other railroads?

RAILROADS AS BANKING CORPORATIONS.

Railroads are supposed to be incorporated for the sole business of transporting freight and passengers, but their "earnings" from this traffic have grown so enormously through the operation of the interstate-commerce law that they are far in excess of their legitimate requirements in the business of transportation. Money has been accumulated in such vast sums that the men in control have used the funds for a new form of banking or speculation.

The railroads now have five times as much of their working capital invested in bonds, stocks, and other "banking" assets as they have invested in equipment, materials, and supplies for conducting the business of transportation.

That is a statement that must astonish the American people. That is a statement that can be verified. That is a statement that ought to call for radical legislation and remedy. That condition of things ought not to be allowed to prevail. These railroad companies should not be permitted to tax the American public to pay dividends on stocks and bonds issued by them for the purpose of buying new railroads and controlling the transportation conditions of the country.

In Statistics of Railways for 1906 (p. 105) appears a "balance sheet" compiled by the statisticians of the Interstate Commerce Commission from the reports received from individual companies. It shows the following figures:

Working assets employed in the business of transportation.

Cost of equipment	$831,365,517
Materials and supplies	185,228,347
	1,016,593,864

Banking assets.

Stocks owned	$1,817,242,555
Bonds owned	642,805,004
Cash and current cash assets	1,259,304,647
Sinking funds and sundries	130,566,158
Miscellaneous	1,172,658,251
Total banking assets	5,022,576,615

In 1897 the "cash and current cash assets" only amounted to $326,707,224.

This "balance sheet" in Statistics of Railways does not include all the railroad corporations of the country. There are many strictly banking or "holding" companies whose capital is not comprised in the statement, because, although organized as railroad companies, they are not engaged in the operation of railways.

In the report on the Intercorporate Relationships of Railways is appears that the total par value of railway securities owned by railway corporations is $5,555,212,497, nearly double the amount that appears in the "balance sheet."

JUG-HANDLED LAW.

A grave injustice has been done to shippers and the public in the national legislation of the past twenty years. The Government has confined its attention entirely to one side of the question, and has used its great power solely to assist the railroads in collecting "earnings" from the public.

The United States Supreme Court has twice decided that a combination or traffic association of railroads to fix or maintain rates is illegal. (Trans-Missouri Freight Association and Joint Traffic cases.) In the face of these decisions, all competitive rates in the United States in the past ten years have been agreed upon and fixed by competing railroads in associations of this illegal character. None of these combinations has ever been made the object of criminal prosecution.

Scores of prosecutions have been instituted against shippers who had failed to pay the uttermost farthing of the rates agreed upon by the railroads in their illegal traffic associations, but no railroad has ever been prosecuted for charging too much.

The law as it stands is a jug-handled law, with the iron grasp of the railroad monopolizing the handle.

The argument against all legislative regulation of business, and especially the business of railroads, is the "general-prosperity" argument. Even if prosperity, brought about and maintained through railroad extortion, were preferable to a normal and quiet condition of business, which I deny, no period of prosperity has ever been due to it, nor has any subsidence of a tide of prosperity ever been justly attributed to the enactment or enforcement of laws against the railroads.

The form that this argument usually takes is an assertion that when the railroads are prosperous or when earnings are large the whole country is prosperous. The principal vice of that argument is that it begs the question and makes an effect do service as a cause. The panic of October, 1907, would under normal conditons have had the same depressing effect upon railroads as upon other lines of business. But the railroads have some advantages over other business institutions. One of these consists in the fact that, being monopolies and being in a combination or having adopted a community of interest plan, they can raise their rates at will and thus recoup their losses after a panic has spent its force, and have the usual monopolistic advantages during a business depression, because there is a large volume of traffic that must go, whether times be flush or dull.

Nevertheless the railway managements are not averse to seeking the lines of least resistance. So it was deemed best, if it could be done, to obtain the assent of the principal shippers throughout the country to an all-round raise of rates; and soon after the depression following the panic began to be felt representatives of railroad interests began what they called a campaign of education preliminary to putting into effect the increase. Among other statements was the assertion that the proceeds of the increase were not to be used for the payment of increased dividends, but to supply capital required for repairs, betterments, and new construction.

And this brings us face to face with a very important and far-reaching question, not often discussed, but which will sometime have to be settled; the sooner the better for all concerned.

The true bearings of the proposition thus advanced was not perceived by the general public. In fact, although it has been a continuous process since railroading in this country had its beginning, its extraordinary character is seldom noted by those in authority, or by publicists. It is taken for granted that after the rough roadway is constructed and the first train passes over it the public can be rightfully taxed not only for profits, dividends, and interest on the original capital, but for all capital thereafter needed, though the enterprise may become a colossal four-track affair, with terminals worth many millions.

The public have been so far schooled in railroad sophistries that they accept as equal in dignity to a truism, or a law of the land, the proposition that the stockholders of public-service corporations are entitled to exact from the public sufficient compensation for services to maintain a certain fixed standard of dividends. So far has this idea taken root that it passes without question, and a compulsory reduction of a dividend rate upon the stock of an important railway gives a shock to financiers and is regarded as in the nature of a public calamity. A thousand business men may lose their margins of profit, or even fail; all the farmers may lose their year's toil; a million laborers may lose their jobs or have their wages reduced. Whoever proposed that the community should insure profits, or good prices, or steady employment, or good wages in these cases would be considered a fit inmate for a madhouse. I leave for others to figure out where this principle of railroad financiering, followed out and perpetuated, will land the whole people. And let it never be forgotten that these stated dividend rates are upon outrageously inflated capitalizations.

The Interstate Commerce Commission stands committed to the economic fallacy that public-service corporations are entitled as of right to remunerative returns upon their stocks in addition to interest on issues of bonds. (See Twenty-second Annual Report, issued December 24, 1908, p. 6.) This heresy, if once accepted and fixed, even as unwritten law, will impoverish the people of the country and transfer to Wall street what still remains of government at Washington. Why should government guarantee the solvency and also the prosperity of railroads, any more than of manufacturers, merchants, and farmers? Railroad magnates are constantly making this claim in concert, and there is not a protest nor even a dissent from any public source.

When other arguments fail, the representatives of these special interests parade the stockholders behind them and admonish the people's representatives to beware of diminishing the value of the stocks in their hands. Is the Government to be made an agency for the exploitation of eighty or ninety million people in order to safeguard and save from loss about one-thousandth of the population? No statute nor any governmental policy is responsible for individuals investing in mining or any other kind of stocks, or in any other personal property. Who is responsible, after all, for what a corporation does, if not its stockholders? If not active participants in the management, they are, nevertheless, responsible by reason of their acquiescence. If they have made a bad deal, it is not the business of the Government either to help them get out or to promote their interests if they stay in. The rule established by statute is that of reasonable rates; and if the Interstate Commerce Commissioners do not enforce that rule, regardless of stockholding interests, then they should be called to account.

Recent investigations in New York have shown, however, that the bulk of railroad stockholding interests are concentrated in the hands of the managers.

Populations of countries have been impoverished and compelled to resort to revolution to escape starvation, and republics have been undermined and destroyed by the insidious introduction into a law of a single vicious economic or political principle; and there is a destructive element in railway policy now crystallized into statute law in the Hepburn rate act, without discussion or protest. It is the legal recognition of the claim long previously urged by interstate carriers that they are entitled to a guaranty from the public, which must use them from necessity, of a regular unfailing profit upon the business they do, whatever fate may befall all other business establishments or ventures.

The people endure many wrongs simply because they do not understand them, which, if fully understood in all their true bearings, would no more be submitted to than would the introduction of an epidemic or an invasion by a hostile foreign force. The established heresy that railroad rates shall in all cases and under all circumstances be sufficiently high to insure an income from investments in railroad property is a discrimination in favor of, and a special favor granted to, that class of capitalists of most serious import and leading inevitably to the absorption by them of a large share of the national wealth. But not until the Hepburn rate bill became a law was the proposition authoritatively sanctioned that their monopolistic power was itself property, to be counted capitalized, estimated, and appraised in ascertaining the aggregate of a railroad's property as a basis for fixing rates.

No procedure is provided by which the Interstate Commerce Commission can make valuations in fixing maximum rates. But in order to commit the Government, the people, and the commission to the theory of enormously evil import, that after considering actual investment and unearned increment the monopoly privilege shall be valued and added, a word was skillfully incorporated in the twentieth section of the bill in such connection as will accomplish that dire and sinister purpose, if ever the commission shall be given effective power to make valuations, without striking that portion out of the rate act. Among the matters which the commission is directed to require carriers to annually report are "the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipments."

Now, a franchise has been defined in varied terminology, but all agree that it is a privilege enjoyed by one to the exclusion of common right, an exclusive privilege such as the privilege to dig up the streets and lay down gas pipes or rails or, in the case of steam railroads, the privilege of constructing tracks over private lands and public property, as the basis of collecting from the public any tolls, rates, or fares whatever. In short, a franchise is such a privilege as would, without a concession or grant by the State, remain a particle of sovereignty to be exercised by the Government for the equal benefit of all. These privileges have been granted to railroad corporations by the federal and state governments without charge. They constitute monopolistic power, and have been used in connection with investments in property to the vast enrichment of the investors. Now comes the Congress of the United States and gives express legislative recognition to the claim, long made by the railroad managements, but heretofore resisted, that these monopolistic privileges are themselves property. This is accomplished by requiring the companies to report and the commission to receive and record "the cost and value of franchise." In view of this statutory status of franchises as property no one need wonder or misunderstand the increase in mileage earnings and in market value of the principal railroad stocks since the act was passed. The most recent report of the Interstate Commerce Commission presents the following figures and facts with respect to railway earnings.

The gross earnings of all railroads for the year ending June 30, 1908, were $2,424,640,637, only $164,464,941 less than the gross earnings of the preceding year of 1907, yet the 1908 earnings are $98,876,470 in excess of the earnings for 1906 and $342,158,231 in excess of those for 1905. At the close of the railroad fiscal year 1907 it was openly claimed by all railroad authorities that the financial condition of the roads had greatly improved, and the increase of dividends confirmed it. There have been no notable reductions of dividend rates. How has it been in other lines of business?

So far as the Supreme Court has expressed itself, its views have been adverse to the right of public-service corporations to any assured and fixed rate of income on investment.

I have endeavored to show that, whatever be the cause of panics and depressions, they are not attributable to the enforcement of law against the railroads. Not only so, but it is also clear that its enforcement, or rather its nonenforcement, has had little, if any, bearing upon the condition of railroad business or upon any general business. Indeed, the subject of panics, depressions, and prosperity has been seized and employed as a subterfuge and a substitute for sound argument, because it was thought that an appeal to the hopes and fears of the unsophisticated might aid in the accomplishment of the end in view—the repeal or emasculation of the antitrust law.

But while the railway managements make a show and pretense of holding council with the shipping interests, they invariably consult their own interests and formulate their plans in advance and in secret. If possible, they hoodwink commercial and other interests; but in case of failure to do so, they proceed to execute their own plans, relying upon tact, intrigue, and the law's delays for a safe deliverance at the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. A notable instance, selected for the purpose of illustration because it is the latest, was the course pursued by the railroads in the movement inaugurated in midsummer, 1908, and consummated in December of that year, for a general advance in rates. The procedure prescribed by the interstate-commerce act for bringing about a change in rates on a certain date is to notify the Interstate Commerce Commission of the proposed increase or decrease thirty days in advance, and the proposed changes are then made public.

The legal situation brought about by the publication of such increase is interesting. The railroads do not have to go through any sort of legal procedure, much less do they have to litigate in advance the right to raise rates. They only have to fix the new rates to go into effect thirty days thereafter, and then they become effective. The burden then continues, except as to such shippers as are in a position to successfully litigate the question of reasonableness with the railroads.

The duty of the commission regarding proposed increases in rates is simply to make the proposed increases public. If shippers object to the increases they must wait until the rate goes into effect, and then start a litigation before the commission, which may go through all the courts to the highest. If the commission decides adversely to the shipper the rate continues in force notwithstanding his objections. In the rare event of the protesting shipper ultimately succeeding there is usually such an all-round change of conditions and relations that it is immaterial to any party to the litigation what may be the final judgment.

The existence of the regulative powers of the commission under these statutes, passed subsequently to the enactment of the antitrust law, is used by the advocates of amendment of the latter as an argument. The argument, if such it may be called, is in substance that the railroads may safely be permitted to form traffic agreements, because, anyhow, their rates and practices are subject to the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is therefore relevant, and perhaps important, to examine this argument carefully and at some length. Its refutation is complete when the interstate-commerce acts and the workings of the commission under them are explained.

The only material interest which the great body of people—the wealth producers and consumers—have in the question of rates is their effect upon the cost of living and the market price of what they produce at the place of production. Has there been any reduction of the one or increase in the other? The cost of living has been increasing for years, and if market prices of what primary producers have to sell have been affected at all at points of production, they have been lowered. Meantime, there is no mistaking the tendency of railroad securities taking the average for several years past. Their trend has been unmistakably upward.

One naturally shrinks from the task of describing the state of the public mind brought about prior to and during the incubation of the so-called "Hepburn rate bill." As to any statement covering the true and false, illuminating and misleading, patriotic and demagogic utterances, that is out of the question. Though the people do not remember very much, nor remember that very long, they have not forgotten the extravagance of the promises concerning results and pretenses of hostility on the part of railway managements to any rate legislation whatever. The latter, it is true, evinced a feeling of uneasiness at first. But as time wore on no class in the country, except those who were, or expected to be, on the Interstate Commerce Commission, were so anxious for the Hepburn bill to pass or so fearful that it might fail as were the railway monopolists.

There were prerogatives which railroad corporations had long usurped in derogation of public right which the people had contested in their helplessness, and the railway owners feared a popular uprising which might lead to some sort of reprisal or radical reform. The problem was how to satisfy without relieving them with a makeshift of legislation, after the manner of quieting them without affording them real relief on previous occasions. The measure with which the public was deceived in the matter of railroad abuses, extortions, and exactions was this rate bill. Many having access to the listening and reading public, some designing to mislead, others ignorantly misleading, are even yet, in face of the obvious facts, proclaiming the rate bill and its enactment a great victory over the corporations controlling transportation, while representatives of the railroads still pretend to protest against it.

But if there had been any real improvement since the act took effect, there would surely have been some subsequent tangible evidences of it. The railroad officials fully understand the benefits conferred by the new law, despite their play in the rôle of injured innocents, and though they are chary of giving publicity in any form to their knowledge, one of them occasionally gives a clear intimation of what they realize the Hepburn Act to have accomplished for them.

It would have required no phenomenal legislative wisdom, only ordinary talent for constructing laws, for Congress to have done what was sorely needed to be done, and the most important of all that could be done, for the great body of the people in the way of rate legislation. Of course rebates must be suppressed and rebating managers and shippers punished; but that might just as well have been done under the provisions of the original act, or of what was known as the "Elkins amendment to the interstate commerce act of 1887," passed at a previous session in 1903, if violations had not been to a great extent condoned by officers charged with the duty of enforcing the laws. There was just one way to relieve the people of the more grievous evil, that of extortion inflicted by transportation monopolies, and that was plain, simple, and adequate. The measure that would really have been serviceable would have been one directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to take up the whole railroad and transportation question of the United States, ascertain what it would cost to reproduce all the roads, including all rolling stock, terminals, and other adjuncts, adding, forsooth, unearned increments; then taking the rates as an entirety and making new rates which would yield the owners a given per cent of income on the investment—say about 4 per cent. This would be 1 per cent advantage over the average of other investments.

All else in the rate bill is of infinitesimal value as compared with what would have been such an equitable, just, and reasonable provision. But by promulgating a voluminous, complicated measure, containing a forest of legislative exotics and a tangled wilderness of words, the combined meaning of which no one can or ever will be able to explain, it was supposed by the sponsors for the bill that its fatal defect would be overlooked, at any rate for as many years as it took to learn how imperfect was the original interstate-commerce law. The act comprises 24 long sections. There are various definitions of things the meaning of which is already well known. Railroad monopoly has a basis so deeply embedded in practices which have become customs, rules that have come to be recognized as municipal law, and terms that have taken their place in the language as truly applicable though meaning something else than that which they are made to represent, that one must be an analyst and a close student of railroad business to detect the impositions. What the railroads collect from the people must be paid, whether the contributors are willing or unwilling. Why not then speak of the aggregate of these tributes as of any other sum total of collections? No; the honest word "earnings" has been borrowed, the better to forestall scrutiny and investigation on the part of the superficial reader of annual reports and railway statistics. When one such reader sees the word "earnings" he gets an impression of something of value, given pursuant to an agreement to perform a service in which there has been an amicable mutuality from inception to liquidation.

But when the railroads of the country use their power to exact from the Nation's traffic $2,424,640,637, as they did during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, much of which was used to pay dividends on stocks representing no actual investment as capital, interest on bonds issued to represent "trusteed" stocks, outrageously inflated and exorbitant salaries, and sums added to private railroad capital in permanent improvements, the use of the term "earnings" is a fraudulent perversion.

It does not require a very deep study of finance to see that if a stockholder owns one-tenth of the stock of a company capitalized at $100,000,000 and out of the income of one year $10,000,000 is used in adding permanent value to its property, he has enjoyed the full benefit of a dividend of 10 per cent, whether or not he has received any dividend whatever specified as such.

When a farmer has marketed his crop and carefully figured out his expenditures while growing, gathering, and delivering it to the buyer, he subtracts the total from the selling price to find his net earnings. He does not also subtract the cost of a new stable or other contemplated or completed improvement from the amount realized to ascertain his earnings.

To see the uses made of misleading terms, we only have to examine the annual returns reported by any railroad, or read the comments thereon in Wall street newspapers. For instance, when in August, 1906, the Southern Pacific declared a dividend on its stupendously inflated common stock, a New York paper congratulated Mr. Harriman and the other big stockholders on their being at last rewarded for their persistent faith in the stock "as an investment." Without going analytically into that corporation's financial history, it may be roughly stated that the controlling interest in this stock came to the original holders as pure bonus, and the balance of the stock was put on the market and bought at a ridiculously low price.

But in the same article it was stated, without the slightest intention of being humorous, that since the reorganizaion $100,000,000 had been appropriated out of net "earnings" to improve the property. That meant that these stockholders had profited to that great extent. The $100,000,000 of net "earnings" probably constituted an excess above reasonable rates and charges equal to that great sum.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in making its reports, has inadvertently fallen into the groove well worn by railway officials in making annual reports. They indulge in the same misleading assumptions and deceptive terminology employed by the railroads. They have never segregated the net earnings so as to show the entire sum of actual profits, itemizing the vast amounts devoted to improvements under that head. In reporting the financial operations of a railroad for a given year the commission should explain, in phraseology with which the general public is familiar, the meaning of the technical terms used in railroad finance, so that the public would fully understand the full import of their reports. But this the commission has thus far never done. An interstate-commerce act which is pretended to be at all comprehensive, but affords no remedy for such abuses, is defective in an important particular, to say the least.

Numerous expensive proceedings are directed in the rate act to be instituted for the accomplishment of useless things and many other things are directed to be done, any attempt to do which must, in the nature of the case, prove wholly abortive. There are other things directed to be done which, though feasible, involve limitless and continuous labor on the part of railroad employees and prodigal expenditures from the National Treasury, necessitated by the employment of a vast army of clerks, the total results of which, when accomplished, are not of the slightest value to the public or to a single individual on the earth.

After illegalizing, in vague terms, several forms of discrimination, and prohibiting generally the granting of free transportation, the act contains a long list of exempt classes, and amongst them "attorneys at law." The exempted classes are thus granted exclusive privileges of considerable value which are denied to the general public. The act allows the commission "to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable rate or rates, charge or charges to be thereafter observed," and so forth, "as the maximum to be charged." But this cautious stipulation is so hedged about by conditions, limitations, provisos, and qualifications in the same and other sections as to render it of little, if of any, value or protection against exorbitant charges. No rule or standard is prescribed for ascertaining the value of railroad property used in transportation. And as the commission can only act upon complaint filed by an injured shipper, and as the filing of such complaint is under the "broad judicial review" provision, merely the commencement of a costly litigation to continue until the relief would not be needed, or would be no help for the wrong done, it is little wonder that not one seriously contested case coming before the commission since the act has been in force has gone to the Supreme Court for review as to the constitutionality of the rate-fixing powers of the commission.

Instead of competition and reduction of freight charges resulting from the rate law, the big systems no longer fear a rate war, and dividends were in 1903 and 1907 considerably increased, notwithstanding vast investments in improvements. The terminal improvements by the Pennsylvania and the New York Central in New York City alone involved the expenditure of hundreds of millions, and such improvements were made by all the roads, though on a less extensive scale. Within three months after the act took effect, the Lake Shore increased its dividend rate from 8 to 12 per cent, and the Michigan Central from 4 to 6 per cent.

These properties are controlled by the New York Central. The New York Central rate was increased about the same time from 5 to 6 per cent. The Norfolk and Western a short while ago was engaged in a disastrous rate war; in 1900 it paid no dividends. It now pays 5 per cent. The Baltimore and Ohio paid 2 per cent in 1900. It now pays 6 per cent. The Chesapeake and Ohio also suffered from the rate war and paid no dividends. Dividends are now paid on its stock. The dividends paid by the Big Four road have been increased from 3 to 4 per cent. Before the rate law went into effect it was generally supposed that it would take a decade at least for the Southern Pacific to recover from the San Francisco earthquake and fire and pay dividends on its common stock. But it now pays 5 per cent. The Union Pacific, which was in the hands of a receiver ten years ago, recently had its dividend rate boosted overnight from 6 to 10 per cent.

The railroads not only retain, but have confirmed to them under the act the most valuable privilege of monopoly, that of exploiting the public to the full extent that the traffic will bear. That is a legislative creation of vast—practically unlimited—value, an asset the right to value at all was previously disputed. The franchises really belong to the people, subject only to use by the railroads upon sufferance. The value of these benefits conferred by the act upon the transportation monopolies can be seen in the substantial and unprecedented rise of railroad securities above referred to, increases in surpluses and dividends reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and commented upon by the press as "evidence of general prosperity reflected in railway earnings."

I do not flatter myself that the deceptions and delusions about rate regulation and control of transportation by act of Congress will be entirely or generally dispelled by this genesis and analysis of the rate act. But it is hoped that it will start an inquiry which may sooner or later lead to important results.

An idea has been carefully and industriously spread abroad that the payment of rebates was about the only evil worth considering or needing a legislation antidote. It was but one form of discrimination practiced by carriers, most other forms being legalized or irremediable. For the prominence given the evil of rebating there were two causes. First, a rebate is a palpable, acute injury, easily defined and measured when the facts are known. Secondly, the crusade for its suppression and for the punishment of those guilty of practicing it was along the lines of least resistance, because none of the railroads were really adverse to the abolition of rebates and the establishment of uniformity as between individuals, if uniformity could be established by law and preserved through a commission standing impartially between them, its expenses and salary charges paid by the Government. It is no secret among those conversant with railroad business that rebating was not only a disagreeable but a costly practice which each railway, being a law unto itself, supposed to be necessary in order to obtain and retain its due share of traffic tonnage. Therefore no one acquainted with the situation was surprised at the acquiescence in the rate bill of railroad officials and attorneys when it was seen that rebating was about the only abuse for which it provided certain punishment as a remedy. Its stringent and specific provisions relieving traffic managers of the strain of watching rivals and struggling for business, and leaving with the railroads the power of equalizing rates upward rather than downward through the friendly agency of a government commission, promised vastly greater pecuniary returns than they enjoyed under the preexisting interstate-commerce act. And this promise has been fully realized.

There can be no question of a popular demand for relief from the abuse of rebating, nor of the merits of the rate bill, in so far as it seeks to end rebating. But that was only one of the reforms desired by the people, and though that was an evil of some magnitude, it was by no means the principal grievance. Except for the fact that the rebates were usually paid to great industrial monopolies and served to build them up to the destruction of competition, the people at large had little interest in that subject of legislation.

But there are discriminations of tenfold greater importance not relieved by this act. For instance, discriminations with reference to priority of shipment and discriminations between kinds of freight and localities.

A provision of the act reads as follows:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality on any particular description of traffic in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, or corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatever.

It will be noted that this purports to embody a general and sweeping prohibition against discriminations. If Congress really had desired to forbid discriminations, it was fully competent to have done so in explicit and unqualified terms. But what it has done was to leave in the hands of the railway managements about the same discriminatory powers that they had previously possessed. For instance, in this general prohibition, instead of saying that "it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to make or give preference or disadvantage," etc., the words "undue or unreasonable" are interpolated, the effect of which is to leave a very wide field of discretion and a license of indefinable scope to the carriers.

There is nothing in the act to prevent outrageous and ruinous discriminations between localities and kinds of traffic. And the people have already had an opportunity to learn how this provision is interpreted by the traffic managers of the country. In the early winter immediately following the taking effect of the act the railroads so used this dangerous and comprehensive discretionary power that suffering, disaster, and death were visited upon many homes in the Northwest by reason of a coal famine, and many farmers were ruined because no cars were furnished in which to move their grain crops to market. Suffering and inconvenience from lack of coal were reported from half a dozen States, and yet there was no shortage in the season's output. The winter up to that period had not been severe, and there had been no snow blockades worth mentioning. The fault was entirely with the railroad companies, and they had been neglecting the people, in their zeal to increase their surpluses, notwithstanding pretenses of shortage of cars. Coal and grain are low-grade, easily handled freight, but do not yield so large revenues as some other kinds. Consequently, they were sidetracked to make room for more profitable business. And this exclusively private view of their business, this notion of absolute irresponsibility to public necessity and convenience, put into practice, caused much loss to the mercantile interests throughout the country and much deprivation and destitution among the poorer classes everywhere, while the railroads were seeking and finding shelter under those conveniently inserted words, "undue and unreasonable."

It is not within the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to afford any relief against such a deplorable state of affairs, no matter how often the railroads in their greed, and in the exercise of their mastery of the situation, see fit to bring it about. The rate law provides no means for determining what is an "undue or unreasonable" discrimination against, or advantage to, a locality, or between classes of traffic. Nothing short of complete control of the entire mileage of the country and of all the rolling stock would enable the commission to prevent such trade catastrophes as that above described.

The rate bill provides, in section 15, that under certain circumstances the commission shall have power—to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable rate, or rates, to be thereafter observed in such case, as the maximum to be charged.

The most important condition precedent to the determination is the filing of a complaint.

The commission has no power to overhaul or readjust or to reduce or to change in any respect whatever the rates of any railroad upon its own initiative, but only "upon the filing of a complaint," making specifications of excessiveness of a rate.

Now, let any citizen, ordinarily circumstanced, put the question to himself whether he is likely ever to file such a complaint. He finds from a study of current history and statistics the railroads have formed gigantic combinations and are collecting from the public each year an amount equal to all the money in circulation and more than twice as much as is collected annually from all sources by the Federal Government. He realizes that the taxing power in this country is not the Government, but the men who control transportation. He may realize that somehow his struggle for a livelihood or for a profit has intensified, and he may strongly believe that excessive charges for transportation are in part responsible for it.

But supposing he feels called upon, individually and on account of the injury to his individual interest, to proceed against so mighty an adversary. In the first place, of course, he must have a lawyer to formulate his complaint and conduct the proceeding, because the statute does not authorize any public officer to begin or prosecute the proceeding, nor, as has been already stated, does it allow the commission to initiate it.

Well, our citizen hires his lawyer, or offers to do so, and the first thing the lawyer does is to ask him for particulars. Unless he is a merchant or manufacturer, or an habitual shipper in some other way, it is just as impossible for him, with or without legal assistance, to formulate a complaint as if he contemplated suing the city or county in which he lives for damages resulting from excessive taxation. We come to the shipper—the merchant, manufacturer, or speculator in products—and we find that he has little, if any, interest in the matter. In the same way that the landlord shifts his taxes to the tenants and the merchant adds to the expenses of conducting business to his selling price, these and other shippers pass over all excessive freight charges to the consuming public, covered up and concealed in the price. As every large shipper knows, however, there is a point at which the shifting process results in reduced consumption and diminishing sales.

Supposing we find a frequent shipper with the requisite hardihood to incur the unrelenting hostility of the railroads, and he hires a lawyer who frames a complaint that on a particular day he sent a shipment of a certain commodity over a given railroad, and the freight charge was, for instance, $10 in excess of "a just and reasonable rate." In due course of the protracted litigation he has thus entered upon he is called upon to prove his allegation.

Here comes in the joker which this act has so conveniently left in the hands of the carriers. The shipper is entirely destitute of any evidence satisfactory to a court of what in the particular instance would be a just and reasonable rate or constitutes an unreasonable charge. In all the cases that have arisen, not once has a court undertaken to determine all the matters that ought to be considered in determining the question; and, in the nature of things, it can not be done. Ten thousand elements enter into the making of each rate for a single railroad. To determine the unreasonableness of a rate, the inquiry does not stop with the intricate and innumerable affairs of the particular company making the charge, but must extend to the interminable affairs of, and relations between, that and every other company in the country with which it competes or holds any connection. Not only so, but since every railroad is connected with ocean or lake transportation, the constantly varying and fluctuating cost of the latter must be ascertained—an utter impossibility.

I repeat that there was just one thing that Congress could have done to afford the relief on this subject to which the people were entitled, and that was to provide and prescribe the necessary procedure for the appraisement and valuation of all the railroad property in the country, and then empower the commission not merely to determine, upon the filing of a complaint, but also whether any complaint was made or not, the just and reasonable rates for the entire traffic on all the roads. Taking the comprehensive valuation thus made, the commission should have been authorized to make a schedule of rates for the country's transportation business in its entirety. Determining what would be a just percentage return upon that valuation, the making of such schedule would be feasible. Anything short of this must leave conditions as bad as before, and even worse than they were found. Not to do this was to be tried and found wanting.

Divergent views have been expressed as to the advisability of making or attempting the valuation. But the principal divergence will be found to exist upon the question of method. Some of the railroad managers insist that such valuation is impossible. But when their arguments are dissected it is found that their objections are based upon a fear that any method that might be adopted would work great injustice to them. No plan or theory of valuation will be here expounded; but I advance the thought that some approximately just standard of valuation can be found. If found to work injustice, it could be changed from time to time, just as assessment rates are changed by States and municipalities.

It seems to be conceded that the Interstate Commerce Commission may make a comparison of rates for the purpose of exercising the power thus narrowly limited by the bill. But that this concession by the railroads was in entire harmony with their general design and determination that the commission should sit only as an equalizing or arbitration board, subserving the interests of the carriers, is easily shown. Mr. Jones, we will suppose, files a complaint alleging that the rate charged by a particular carrier on wheat from a point in Kansas to Chicago is 20 cents per hundred, and that that rate is "unjust and unreasonable," following the language of this act, and that a just and reasonable rate would be 10 cents per hundred, and asking that a maximum rate be fixed by the commission which shall be just and reasonable. Now, all that the commission can do, in order to determine whether or not the complaint is well founded, is to compare the existing rate of 20 cents, which the carrier has fixed, with the rates charged by other carriers for carrying that commodity; or if the carrier complained against has no competitor, the only recourse of the commission would be to take a comparison with its rates on other commodities.

Either comparison, however, is between rates, all of which may be 50, 100, or 500 per cent above what are reasonable and just. But as to the justness or unjustness, and reasonableness or unreasonableness, of the whole schedule of rates the commission has no jurisdiction to investigate. It is powerless to extend its inquiry beyond the allegations of the complaint before it, nor can it make any valid finding or order with respect to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of any rate besides that specified in the complaint, and therefore any finding or order reducing that rate is liable to be set aside by the courts as one made arbitrary and upon insufficient evidence. So, though the commission should be of the opinion that the carrier had in force a schedule of rates yielding dividends on a hundred millions of stocks that represented but a small investment, or none at all, it could afford no relief. The commission does, in fact, sometimes set aside rates made by railroads and substitute lower rates; but when it has done so the premises upon which it based its rulings were purely speculative and its conclusions mere guesswork.

In the first case carried to the Supreme Court under the interstate-commerce act of 1887, involving the exercise of the power of the commission to substitute a rate in lieu of the one found to be unjust and unreasonable, it was held that the commission possessed no such power. That left the power to fix rates just where it was before, namely, in the hands of the railroads, subject to no control or restraint except the roundabout and ineffective power to resort to the courts for an injunction or the wholly abortive remedy of an action for damages. Now, the thing principally desired by the people and originally recommended by the commission and the President, the thing upon which most stress was continually laid, was such an amendment of the interstate-commerce act as would confer upon the commission the power to fix rates.

The foundation of the demand upon Congress for legislation was not merely the practice of discriminating or payment of rebates, but also relief of the public from rates that were too high. The reason it was desired to vest the fixing of rates in an official body was that the railroads had abused the power and robbed their patrons through excessive charges. Such official body it was thought might be trusted to stand and act impartially between the people and the carriers, nor was there any doubt, in the mind of any fair and reasonable man, that a commission could be found that could be trusted to that extent. But the railroad interests were unwilling to trust any commission, and set themselves doggedly against the proposition of doing so. And it was through fear that, in spite of the legal cunning employed in framing the bill, some such power might have been inadvertently conferred upon the commission, that the "broad judicial review" amendment was adopted, the effect of which was to empower the carrier to wipe out and annul any order of the commission fixing a maximum rate and to lift the whole subject-matter of a complaint into the courts where it has to be reexamined in all its aspects, de novo. So, if the carrier be disposed to take an appeal, no final decision can be reached for years. In the meantime, the conditions demanding the special relief prayed in the complaint will have radically changed, and a decision in favor of the complainant will be valueless. Any vitality that might have remained in the act was eliminated, and the rate-fixing feature, which alone justified the bill being called a "rate" bill, was obliterated as completely as if the amendment had said, in identical words: "But the exercise of the maximum rate-making power hereby conferred shall be of no force or effect unless the action of the commission shall be entirely satisfactory to the carrier; and in any case of the carrier objecting to the action of the commission, such carrier may resort to the courts as heretofore, and by so resorting nullify any action so taken by the commission."

It is not to be wondered at, then, that thus far very little has been done by the commission except what was entirely satisfactory to the railroads.

The report received from the commission in response to the resolution of the House asking information with respect to the increases in freight rates throughout the different sections of the country is such as to satisfy every one that excessive increases in freight rates have been made and that the time has come for the people of the country, through their representatives to enact such legislation as will prevent a continuance of excessive charges for the movement of commodities.

This, in my judgment, can be done only by the enactment of a law giving power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to pass upon the rates made by the carriers of the country before they become effective; or, better still, to make a valuation of the properties of the carriers of the country and fix the rate upon such a basis as will yield them a reasonable return upon such valuation.

The time has come when the American people must see that the laws controlling the transportation companies of the country are enacted in the interest of the American people. The railroad revenues for the last year amounted to about $2,500,000,000.

This last year was said to be one of the worst business years that this country has seen for a decade, and yet while these revenues were only about $164,000,000 less than they were in 1907, they were ninety-eight and odd millions of dollars more than they were in 1906, which was one of the best years ever known in this country. And they were three hundred and forty-two millions more than the revenues of 1905, and 1905 is conceded to have been the best year in the business of this country in all its history. So that while the business done in the year of 1908 was something vastly less in volume in all lines throughout the country than in 1905, nevertheless the revenues of the railroad companies in 1908 were $342,000,000 more. Now, this could not have been the case but for the fact that higher rates were charged—unjust, inequitable rates—and the time has come when power must be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rates before they go into force, or, better still, make a physical valuation of all the railroad properties in the country, allow the railroads a proper amount for increments, fix this valuation on a fair basis, allowing the railroads to earn proper dividends on this valuation, and fix the rates on such a basis that nothing more than a fair interest will be permitted under any circumstances to be earned on the actual value of the property. [Applause.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I have been very much interested in the gentleman's discussion of railroad revenue, and I want to ask a question with reference to that. Does he mean by revenues the receipts for handling freight and passengers? Or does the word "revenues" include the large amount of bonds and stocks and currency which he has stated the railroads own?

Mr. MADDEN. No; by no means. I think the railroad companies ought not to be allowed to tax the American people on anything beyond the actual value of the property which they own, and which is used exclusively for transporting the commodities of the country.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I agree with the gentleman in that.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time at my disposal I desire to call attention to some tendencies in our national and political life which seem to me to merit the careful consideration of all who are interested in the permanent prosperity of our Republic.

In a little more than a century our people have emerged from the quiet retirement and laborious struggles of pioneer life into a period of intense material activity. The simplicity and economy which were the prominent characteristics of life in the early days have given place to a much more luxurious and extravagant mode of life. The dignified repose which in the days of simple living gave time and disposition for careful thought has been banished by the frenzied rush for gold and the honors and pleasures that gold will provide. The central ideas around which life revolved in the years succeeding the Revolution were the ideas of national glory and individual liberty.

Political movements and policies of government were scrutinized with care and all the safeguards which our dual form of government provides for protecting individual rights and liberties were kept constantly in mind. Any invasion, even the slightest, by the Federal Government of the rights of the States as understood by their people was vigorously resisted. Any attempt by government or wealth to encroach upon the rights or liberties of the individual was quickly detected and as speedily prevented.

The development of our wonderful material resources gradually through the passing years attracted the attention of the people more and more and has now become the all-absorbing passion. Our thoughts have become so engaged with material things that we have failed to notice the tendency of government to consider material things more carefully, and individual rights less carefully, than in the earlier years. We have permitted and encouraged the combination of capital and the consequent centralization of power to an extent that many consider a menace to our future, and that all agree renders the proper regulation of such combinations a very difficult matter.

Changed conditions, brought about by increased wealth, increased population, and the extension of national boundaries, have brought other vexing questions in the administration of government to which our people, absorbed in material things, may be paying too little heed. A hundred years ago the three branches of the Federal Government were, in popular estimation, regarded as equal and each supreme in its own jurisdiction. To the minds of many in our day the executive branch of the Government seems to be the seat of powers which were formerly conceded to be solely within the province of the legislative branch of government, and what would once have been regarded as an unwarranted encroachment on the legislative branch of government is now regarded with complaisance.

In saying this I do not wish to be considered as in any manner reflecting on that distinguished citizen who now occupies the presidential chair, for no man in his generation has more accurately charted the course nor more skillfully applied the force of public sentiment.

Another evidence of the drift away from early ideals is found in the sentiment that sustains and approves military and naval establishments maintained on a scale that would have been considered a public menace a century ago, and at an expense which would have been considered appalling then.

Colonial establishments have been created and governments to which the consent of the governed has never been given and which would have been considered obnoxious to our form of government then are now looked upon without displeasure, if not viewed with favor.

Only a day or two ago in this body, which should, and many hold does, reflect the sentiment of the people, legislative sanction was given to the establishment in the Panama Canal Zone of a form of government bearing little resemblance to that government which was the idol and ideal of our fathers.

The construction of the Panama Canal, the greatest building project ever undertaken by any nation, a project the expense of which can not even now be estimated with any degree of accuracy, but which will certainly be a burden on our people for a generation, has been intrusted to an Executive already overburdened with a multiplicity of official duties, and the legislative branch of the Government in effect surrenders all control over these enormous expenditures. Another evidence of this drift that is going on is found in the numerous departments, bureaus, and divisions which have been created and which deal very largely with matters once held to be distinctly within the province of the governments of the several States. States, too, that formerly looked with disfavor, if not distrust, upon any action of the Federal Government tending toward even a participation in matters within the State, now welcome federal assistance in public enterprises. Where formerly a strict construction of the Constitution was demanded when examining the granted powers enumerated there, a very liberal interpretation of those powers is favored by public sentiment.

Formerly the National Government administered the national domain lying within the limits of a State with a view to the greatest possible benefit of the State and of its citizens with the least possible interference by the National Government. Now the policy of the Government is much more cautious. Forest lands are reserved from sale, mineral rights are withheld, and the growth of population in newer States is thus retarded, and public sentiment sustains it. In other days those were the means relied upon for building up the prosperity of the frontier. Now we even welcome a commission entering the older States to tell the people on the farms how to improve the condition of that home life on the farm, which has been the purest and best in all our national history. Formerly the matter of education within the State was considered as a matter exclusively within the province of the State to regulate. Now, by executive representation, the legislators of a great State are urged to refrain from an act of regulation believed by them to be in the interest of that civilization which is the heritage received from all the centuries of progress of the Caucasian race, and are warned that grave consequences may result from their refusal to follow this advice.

With no desire to be considered as an incendiary, I pass in sad but unforgetting silence from this picture, only pausing to suggest that the drumbeats of the Revolution are coming to us faintly now, and soon no murmur from those notes that woke to life the slumbering spirit of liberty will reach us if we continue in our wanderings from the principles which the founders of our country established for our guidance. The public purse that once was guarded with a watchful eye is subjected to greater and greater drains each year. The revenues to fill up the void are bearing heavier and heavier on those least able to provide, while those who benefit the most from legislation pay the least. Salaries go on increasing, officials multiply, and a civil pension list is gradually creeping on us.

Again, it is asserted that this tendency away from earlier ideals may even be noted in the rules which govern and direct the course of business in this branch of the legislative department of government, and it is one of the hopeful signs that in that political party which is now charged with the duty of legislating an attempt is being made to at least prevent the further extension of this tendency, and if possible to direct the course toward that less obstructed channel formerly traversed.

That confidence which the people are wont to repose in their leaders is to some extent responsible for this drift toward autocratic rule and centralization of government.

A relaxation of watchfulness by the public encourages, or at least tends, toward a corresponding relaxation of watchfulness on the part of their leaders, and the drift goes on so quietly, almost imperceptibly, that before we are aware we have entered channels new and strange, whose course is uncharted and which terminate we know not where. The duty rests on both to guard with care the vessel laden with so much of priceless value to humanity.

If time permitted, I might point to many other indications that we are gradually and not very slowly, after all, considering the duration of nations, drifting away from that conception of government which our fathers held; but what I have stated is sufficient for my purpose.

I do this in no spirit of pessimism, for I do not believe that our people will ever permit our liberties to be destroyed, but so insidious is the growth of that spirit opposed to democracy that it is well to always keep its progress in our minds. We can not sound the channel too often if we would keep our ship of state in safe and peaceful waters.

That our people will always continue to regard the accumulation of wealth, the display of luxury, as the highest ambition of life I can not believe. That the pomp and trappings of power can permanently blind us to the disadvantages, the deprivations, the want, and misery that are their necessary attendants is certainly impossible.

That the simple life of industry, economy, and the highest physical and intellectual development is the life that in the end will appeal to the sound reason of a practical people such as ours, and that a plain government, economically administered and resting as lightly on their shoulders as the necessities of permanent safety, order, and tranquillity require will in the end prevail I am absolutely confident.

A hundred years ago, in a humble cabin on a hillside of Kentucky, was born that man whose centenary the country has just celebrated with all the manifestations of universal reverence. It is not for his great achievements alone, but for that example of simple life, enduring faith, and sleepless patriotism, which, through him, his country confides to the ages that his memory will survive when the proudest thrones have crumbled and their occupants are dust. It is well that by common consent, without compulsion of law, his birthday was by the people proclaimed as a holiday, for, contemplation of that brave, sincere character must tend to impress upon the people the uselessness of unnecessary wealth, the hatefulness of autocratic power, the nobleness of honest and disinterested patriotism, and the beauty of a simple, loving life. It is such examples as this, such living as he lived and loving as he loved, that will cause his countrymen to know and understand and believe the sentiment expressed by that other great American, President Andrew Jackson, in a message to the Senate:

"It is not in a splendid government, supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratical establishments, that the people will find happiness or their liberties protected, but in a plain system, void of pomp—protecting all and granting favors to none—dispensing its blessings like the dews of heaven, unseen and unfelt save in the freshness and vigor they contribute to produce. It is such a government that the genius of our people requires—such a one only under which our States may remain for ages to come, united, prosperous, and free." [Loud applause.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I was to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, but I do not see him here. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN].

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make some remarks upon the Sherman antitrust act, principally as it relates to so-called "business combinations," and shall confine myself to commenting upon the scope of the act as now interpreted by the courts, the reason why the various interests affected desire that the law should be amended, and the objections made to the amendments which have been proposed.

This act was passed July 2, 1890, for the purpose, as it was then stated, of extending the provisions of the common law to interstate commerce and to enforce them by suitable penalties, and runs, in part, as follows:

> Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

The act as at first interpreted by the courts did not seriously embarrass business combinations, for the reason that it was held not to apply to contracts not in unreasonable restraint of trade. As a rule, where the combination effected did not control the entire product in any given industry, it was held to be not inhibited by the Sherman Act, which was passed ostensibly to extend the common law affecting contracts in restraint of trade to interstate commerce, and it was a well-known doctrine of the common law that the validity of contracts restricting competition was to be determined by the reasonableness of the restriction, and hence contracts made for a legal purpose which were not unreasonably injurious to the public welfare and which imposed no heavier restraint on trade than the interest of the favored party required, were, as a rule, held to be valid, both before and after the passage of the Sherman Act.

But in March, 1897, in the trans-Missouri case, the Supreme Court placed the construction upon the Sherman antitrust act that all contracts affecting interstate commerce which in any way restrained trade, whether reasonable or not, were invalid, the conclusion of a majority of the court being that—

> Congress has, so far as its jurisdiction extends, prohibited all contracts or combinations in the form of trusts entered into for the purpose of restraining trade and commerce.

This decision has, as a matter of course, been followed by the lower courts, and the trade combinations which before the decision had been held to be legal were by it made illegal, and it became impossible for manufacturers and others safely to enter into any agreement, however reasonable, for the maintenance of prices; and many of them, finding that they could not legally organize trade combinations, consolidated their interests and the trusts, as we know them, were created.

A distinction has been made between contracts in restraint of trade and combinations and conspiracies to monopolize trade. For example, a man sells out his business and good will and agrees that for a limited time or in a limited territory he will not engage in the business. Here the main purpose is the sale of the business. Ancillary to this is the contract in restraint of trade—that is, the agreement on the part of the vender not to compete with the vendee, a contract which the vender is compelled to make in order to sell his business. It is this sort of contract, it is asserted, that the common law permits when reasonably necessary to the main purpose to be effected.

On the other hand, if a number of manufacturers engaged in interstate business agree upon a schedule of prices for their product, whatever it may be, we have, it is asserted, a combination and conspiracy to monopolize trade which is void at common law, irrespective of whether the combination is reasonable or not.

In the Addyston Pipe and Steel Company case, Judge Taft, in speaking of the trade and business combinations of which I have just given an example, says:

> In such a case there is no measure of what is necessary to the protection of either party, except the vague and varying opinion of judges as to how much, on principles of political economy, men ought to be allowed to restrain competition. There is in such contracts no main lawful purpose, to subserve which partial restraint is permitted, and by which its reasonableness is measured; but the sole object is to restrain trade, in order to avoid the competition which it has always been the policy of the common law to foster.

If this be the correct interpretation of the law, then it is obvious that every business combination, whether reasonable or unreasonable, is void at common law and obnoxious as well to the Sherman Act, as the Supreme Court has held.

If the Sherman Act was only intended to apply to contracts in unreasonable restraint of trade, and the decision of the Supreme Court in 1897 so construed the act that it inhibited all combinations, good or bad, which in any way restrained trade, and waiving for the moment the objections urged by Judge Taft in the Addyston case, it would seem to be a simple matter to amend the act by limiting it to combinations in unreasonable restraint of trade.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to ask him, what, if any, contract in restrain of trade would not be unreasonable?

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Chairman, I have already attempted to answer that question as to existing law by citing the decision of Judge Taft, in which he held that at the common law all contracts of the modern combination type would have been held as tending to monopoly, and hence void.

Senator FORAKER proposed such an amendment in January, 1904, in the Fifty-eighth Congress, in Senate bill 3937, which ran as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That nothing in the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, or in the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, approved July 2, 1890, or in any act amendatory of either of said acts, shall hereafter apply to foreign commerce, or shall prohibit any act or any contract in restraint of trade or commence among the several States, provided that such restraint be reasonable, or shall hereafter authorize imprisonment or forfeiture of property as punishment for any violation of such acts, except for perjury or contempt of court.

And in the first session of this Congress Senator FORAKER introduced another bill (S. 6331) to legalize contracts and agreements not in unreasonable restrain of trade or commerce, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That nothing in the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, or in the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, approved July 2, 1890, or in the act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, approved August 27, 1894, or in any act amendatory of or supplementary to any of said acts, shall hereafter be construed or held to prohibit any contract, agreement, or combination that is not in unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce with foreign nations or among the several States.

Assuming for the moment that the Sherman Act can be amended so as to permit of combinations in reasonable restraint of trade, it is urged that this would destroy the penal features of the law, for the reason that in order to constitute a crime the act to be committed must be one which can be defined with such exactness that the person about to commit it may know in advance whether it will be criminal or not. Now, it is asserted that there is no standard which will enable one to determine in advance whether any given combination in restraint of trade will be held to be reasonable or not, and a combination reasonable at one time may be unreasonable at another. If reasonable, the amended Sherman Act would not be violated; if unreasonable, a crime will have been committed, and the determination of this question might be different in different jurisdictions, so that the same combination might by one court be held harmless and by another criminal, and hence the penal section of the Sherman Act would be void for uncertainty. If this view be correct, then the penal part of the Sherman Act, providing for fine and imprisonment for anyone who engages in a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade, would be held void if the criminality of the act depended upon whether such combination were reasonable or unreasonable. There would then be nothing left of the law but the civil remedy of injunction.

There is good authority for this proposition in Tozer v. The United States. (52 Fed. Rept., 917.) Mr. Justice Brewer said:

> But in order to constitute a crime the act must be one which the party is able to know in advance whether it is criminal or not. The criminality of an act can not depend upon whether a jury may think it reasonable or unreasonable. There must be some definiteness and certainty.

Admit all this to be true; however, it does not diminish the necessity for amending the law, but merely increases the difficulty of doing it in a way to obviate all objections.

In a message to Congress last winter the President said, speaking of the Sherman Act:

> It should be so amended as to forbid only the kind of combination which does harm to the general public, such amendment to be an incident of a grant of supervisory power to the Government over these big concerns engaged in interstate business.

It was for the evident purpose of carrying out the President's recommendation that House bill No. 19475, known as the "Hepburn bill," was introduced in the last session of Congress.

So far as business combinations are concerned, this bill provides that any party to a contract or combination may file a copy of such contract with the Commissioner of Corporations, whereupon the commissioner, with the concurrence of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may, with or without a hearing, enter an order declaring that in his judgment such contract or combination is in unreasonable restraint of trade. If no such order shall be made within thirty days after filing such contract, no prosecution by the United States shall lie unless the same be in unreasonable restraint of trade among the several States or foreign nations, but the United States may institute a suit on account of any such contract or combination of which a copy shall not have been filed or as to which an order shall have been entered as provided.

This bill was considered by a subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary at the last session of Congress, and the testimony fills 750 printed pages. The matter is still pending before the committee. It will be noticed that none of the legal questions which have been raised are avoided in this bill. The duty of determining whether a contract is in unreasonable restraint of trade or not is in the first instance merely shifted from the court to the Commissioner of Corporations.

While no action has been had upon this matter by the Judiciary Committee of the House, so far as I am advised, a bill substantially like it, known as the "Warner bill" (S. 6440), was carefully considered by the Senate Judiciary Committee, and an adverse report was made under date of January 26, 1909, from which I quote the following conclusion as to the power sought to be conferred upon the Commissioner of Corporations, to which I have referred to above:

> The result is that, technically as to criminal prosecutions and practically as to civil prosecutions, a dispensing power, a power of granting immunity, is in the one case conferred on a mere bureau head * * * without notice or hearing and wholly ex parte, a course of procedure that would not be tolerated in any court of our country. * * * Shall we confer a power upon the mere head of a bureau that the Parliament of England was unwilling to accord to the King, and which they regarded as a menace to their liberties? To do this would be a most serious departure from the fundamental principles of our Government, and would do violence to what we conceive to be due process of law.

And the Senate committee concludes its report by saying:

> To amend the antitrust act as suggested by this bill would be to entirely emasculate it, and for all practical purposes render it nugatory as a remedial statute. Criminal prosecutions would not lie and civil remedies would labor under the greatest doubt and uncertainty. The act as it exists is clear, comprehensive, certain, and highly remedial. It practically covers the field of federal jurisdiction, and is in every respect a model law. To destroy or undermine it at the present juncture, when combinations are on the increase and appear to be as oblivious as ever of the rights of the public, would be a calamity.

Is this to be the last word in any attempt to amend the Sherman Act? Is the Sherman Act in every respect a "model law?" The President evidently does not think so, for he has frequently urged Congress to amend it. In his special message to Congress dated March 25, 1908, President Roosevelt said:

> This antitrust act was a most unwisely drawn statute. It is mischievous and unwholesome to keep upon the statute book, unmodified, a law like the antitrust law, which, while in practice only partially effective against vicious combinations, has nevertheless in theory been construed so as sweepingly to prohibit every combination for the transaction of modern business. The Congress can not afford to leave it on the statute book in its present shape.

The business interests evidently do not think so, because they are clamoring for some relief from its operations. Mr. Knapp, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, has said of it:

> I believe the most mischievous piece of legislation in the history of the country is the Sherman antitrust law, as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court. It is intolerable and strikes a blow at development and progress.

I can not better state the necessity for some amendatory legislation than to quote from the testimony taken by the subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee, to whom the bill upon which the Senate committee reported adversely was referred, where, on page 11 of the printed hearings, Mr. Seth Low said:

> As a result of a long series of decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States, it is at last made clear to everybody doing interstate commerce by the methods of combination which are characteristic of these times that much of such business is done contrary to law. Common carriers, business corporations, and business men, labor organizations, and labor men, have all had it brought home to them, one after another, that under the terms of the Sherman antitrust law a large part of the business done in the United States at the present time is being done contrary to law. Cooperative associations and other associations of farmers are subject to the same statute. * * * As a further aggravation of the situation, the antitrust law is a penal one. Yet no one is able to be sure as to certain agreements whether they are unlawful or not. Anyone making an agreement of such a sort affecting interstate commerce and who does business under it, does it at his own risk; and long after the agreement has been made he may find out that he has rendered himself liable to imprisonment as well as to a heavy fine. I respectfully submit that this is a situation which is literally intolerable. It inevitably leads to a wide disregard of the statute upon the theory that "necessity knows no law," because business to be done at the present time must be done by modern methods, and these often involve some restraint of trade. The preservation of our forests, for example, by agreement between the owners as to the amount of timber to be cut year by year is probably impossible under such a law, because such an agreement involves a restraint in trade. Beyond this, the statute itself constantly acts in restraint of trade, for the reason that only what is necessary is likely to be undertaken in the face of the penalties which the statute provides. A better method for sapping enterprise could scarcely be devised.

It is to this bill that the Commissioner of Corporations refers in his recent report, dated January 27, 1909, in which he states:

> The most important legal work of the bureau in the last fiscal year was in connection with a bill for the amendment of the Sherman law of 1890.

Later in the report, and speaking in aid of the general proposition of the necessity for corporate regulation, the commissioner states that, in his opinion, such a system should provide for regular reports from the large interstate corporations, and that such a system should, if possible, be voluntary.

Continuing, he says:

> A compulsory law would bring in a vast number of small concerns technically, indeed, engaged in interstate commerce, but only of local character and of no public interest. Under an optional act these would not register, nor would there be any strong public reason for their doing so. This practical result would do away with much of the inconvenience to individuals which would be caused by a general compulsory system and would relieve the Government of a mass of unnecessary detail.

And later he makes the statement:

> By vigorous effort there has been created a current of opinion which will amply support a modern system of regulation when once the details thereof are properly worked out. Attempts have already been made in this direction. These were exemplified in a bill introduced in the last session of Congress, intended to amend the Sherman antitrust law. It represented an attempt to bring about some such constructive system of publicity as above outlined. It was wholly optional and did not compel any corporation to subject itself to its provisions unless that corporation so chose. It also proposed to modify the present sweeping prohibition against all combination. It recognized, as suggested above, the propriety of reasonable combination. Prominent financial and corporate leaders stated that if the bill were passed they would at once accept its provisions and bring their corporations under its operation. To be allowed to register under a uniform law, to obtain a federal standing as a corporation rendering open accounts to a federal office, was recognized by them as a commercial asset well purchased by a reasonable degree of publicity.

The suggestion of the commissioner that the law governing reports from corporations engaged in interstate business should be voluntary, because a compulsory law would bring in a vast number of small concerns engaged in interstate commerce but only of local character, would seem to be a wise one, for the reason that the commissioner and his office force would probably be physically unable to deal with the reports if made by all corporations engaged in interstate business. In the whole country there must be upward of 50,000 of these small business corporations. Many of them doubtless have been, and very likely are now, members of combinations which are in contravention of the Sherman law as construed by the Supreme Court. It is obvious that with combinations of this sort Congress can have no concern and should not attempt to exercise any control over them.

I am informed that this Hepburn bill (No. 19745) has been abandoned by its proponents, who are satisfied that it provides for a scheme which is practically unworkable, and the report of the Senate committee, to which I have referred, condemns it unqualifiedly.

In a recent statement, Mr. Taft, the President-elect, said:

Every business man who is obeying the law may go ahead with all the energy in his possession; every enterprise which is within the statutes may proceed without fear of interference from the administration, when acting legally; but all interests within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government may expect a rigid enforcement of the laws against dishonest methods.

This is reassuring so far as it goes, but the crux of the situation is that business combinations affecting interstate business can not now be made without violating the Sherman Act. It is obvious that any combination which is organized contrary to law, however beneficent its purpose and however honest its administration, is an illegal combination, and an illegal combination is obviously a bad one, and the distinction can no longer be made between the good trusts and the bad trusts, because all being contrary to the law, they are all bad.

In a recent case, that of the United States against The American Tobacco Company, the court says:

Disregarding various dicta and following the several propositions which have been approved by successive majorities of the Supreme Court, this language [referring to the Sherman Act] is to be construed as prohibiting any contract or combination whose direct effect is to prevent the free play of competition, and thus tend to deprive the country of the services of any number of independent dealers, however small. As thus construed the statute is revolutionary. * * * The act may be termed revolutionary because, before its passage, the courts had recognized a "restraint of trade," which was held not to be unfair, but permissible, although it operated in some measure to restrict competition. * * * The act, as above construed, prohibits every contract or combination in restraint of competition. Size is not made the test: Two individuals who have been driving rival express wagons between villages in two contiguous States, who enter into a combination to join forces and operate a single line, restrain an existing competition, and it would seem to make little difference whether they make such combination more effective by forming a partnership or not.

If the law is here correctly stated, existing conditions would appear to be intolerable.

A recent interesting contribution to this subject should not be overlooked. I refer to a speech recently made in the House by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, who advances the proposition, new so far as my knowledge of the subject goes, that inasmuch as Congress has the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes," every contract which restrains interstate commerce is void ab initio. He states this proposition as follows:

The power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations is by the Constitution exclusively committed to Congress, and Congress can not delegate nor in any manner part with this exclusive authority. The power is not only exclusive, but limited to regulating commerce between the States and with foreign nations, and any attempt by contract or otherwise to regulate commerce between the States or with foreign nations is void.

The talk about amending the Sherman law practically amounts to nothing, as the prohibitory part is of no effect. The penal part is the only thing of value, as Congress has a right to make it a penal offense to regulate or restrain commerce between the States or with foreign nations. It does not need an act of Congress to prevent the regulation of commerce between the States or with foreign nations by contract or otherwise. Any such contract is void and can be annuled by a court without legislation.

If this be sound doctrine, then it follows, as the distinguished gentleman states in his speech (in speaking of the Sherman Act), that—

The prohibitory part of the statute is unauthorized and absolutely unnecessary, therefore no amendment of value can be made to the same.

And hence it follows that every contract between citizens of different States which in any way restrains trade is void ab initio, being inhibited by the constitutional provision giving Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several States.

If this doctrine be sound, it would certainly be attended by very far-reaching consequences, rendering nugatory most of the legislation affecting interstate commerce. What Congress will do for the relief of existing conditions can not, of course, be foretold.

I would suggest that the first step to take is to pass legislation which shall make the Sherman antitrust act what those who framed it thought it to be—namely, an inhibition of contracts in unreasonable restraint of trade. This could be accomplished by enacting a bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That nothing in the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, approved July 2, 1890, or any act amendatory thereof, shall hereafter prohibit any act or any contract in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States: Provided, That such restraint be reasonable.

If the Sherman Act, as so amended, were made indefinite, then the penal section of the act would fall, as I have suggested above, and it is also possible that the same contract restraining trade might be held to be reasonable in one jurisdiction and unreasonable in another; but in such cases there would, of course, always be an appeal open to the Supreme Court.

And we are experiencing at present in other fields of litigation, and always have suffered, the inconvenience of conflicting decisions on the same state of facts in different jurisdictions. Nor do I think that the public would materially suffer if the penal part of the statute were to fall. The civil remedy of injunction is, after all, the one upon which to rely for relief. In the case of a combination in unreasonable restraint of trade, what brings relief to the public is not putting the promoters in jail, but breaking up the combination.

There is strong support for the amendment to which I have called attention. Under date of December 20, 1902, Senator Hoar, then chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, wrote to Mr. KNOX, then Attorney-General, in regard to the Sherman antitrust act, and, among other things, asked him for—any suggestions that your reflection or experience shall suggest as to what may be desirable in the way of further legislation.

Mr. KNOX, in his reply, dated January 3, 1903, Senate Document No. 73, second session Fifty-seventh Congress, said, among other things:

It is difficult to improve upon the great unwritten code known as the "common law." Under its salutory guaranties and restraints the English-speaking people have attained their wealth and power. It condemns monopoly and contracts in restraint of trade as well. The distinction, however, between restraints that are reasonable in view of all the circumstances and those which are unreasonable is recognized and has been followed in this country by the courts. * * *

This distinction makes a rule that may be practically applied.

Congress can, if it sees fit, adopt the scheme of that law. In the enforcement of such law each case as it arose would be considered upon its own facts, and the rule of guidance would be as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, that is—

Public welfare is first considered, and if it be not involved and the restraint upon one party is not greater than protection to the other party requires, the contract may be sustained. The question is whether, under the particular circumstances of the case and the nature of the particular contract involved in it, the contract is or is not reasonable.

This rule has often been stated, and is substantially as follows:

That contracts made for a legal purpose, which are not unreasonably injurious to the public welfare and which impose no heavier restraint on trade than the interest of the favored party requires, are sustained, notwithstanding their tendency to some extent to check competition.

It has taken us eighteen years, more or less, to bring the Sherman law to a point where it inhibits all combinations, good or bad, which restrain trade. The progress toward a more rational condition of things must necessarily be slow, and I suggest as a first step the importing of the quality of reasonableness, as suggested above, which was construed out of the law by the trans-Missouri decision in 1897. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss briefly the rules of this House and to suggest some amendments thereto. Before doing so I wish to strongly disavow being actuated by any personal consideration. I have no grievance of any kind against the Speaker or any Member of this body. My criticisms are not directed at individuals, but against a parliamentary system which is an evolution, and has come about partly by changes in the rules by the votes of previous Houses, partly by decisions of the various occupants of the chair in the past thirty years, and partly by the growth of customs entirely outside of all rules.

Rules are, of course, necessary for the government of all legislative bodies, but no matter how carefully drawn never reach perfection. They are all the result of evolution and always have frequently changed and always must frequently change with changing conditions so as to adapt themselves more perfectly to the needs of the body which alone gives them force.

Something like twenty-nine years ago there was a general revision of the rules of the House of Representatives. Nearly half of the rules in force prior to that time were either dropped entirely or were so changed as to be unrecognizable. In 1896 there was another revision; and many changes in the rules were made from time to time prior to 1880. To propose a change in the present rules is therefore not in the nature of an onslaught on time-tried and approved customs. It is only a suggestion to modify a set of rules not twenty years old.

As to the necessity for a change, I am quite well aware that there is a difference of opinion. Members of this House much more experienced and longer in service than I am maintain that no change is necessary. While respecting their opinion, after four years' experience in the House I am strong in the conviction that there must be a change in the rules unless the House of Representatives is to permanently degenerate into a machine for registering the will of the Speaker. At the opening of each Congress the House is complete master of itself for one hour only—just long enough to elect a Speaker and pass a motion to make the rules of the prior Congress the rules of the opening one. By these two acts, as the rules have been administered and interpreted since I have been a Member of this House, on the first day of each Congress the Members vote away their independence and most of their power for two years beyond the possibility of recall. By these two acts most of us abdicate the authority with which the Constitution has clothed us; put our legislative consciences largely into the keeping of the Speaker for the balance of our term; give to one man greater legislative power than is exercised by any living human being, unless it is the Czar of Russia; reduce ourselves to the level of suppliants at the door of the Speaker's room, begging the permission of the master of the House to make any motion or bring up any matter in which we may be interested; and reserve for ourselves power to do little more than to be counted when necessary to make a quorum, and to vote yea or nay on such propositions as are permitted to come before us for consideration.

These may seem to be strong words, but they are not stronger than I believe the facts warrant. I believe it is best to speak plainly about so very important a matter, but I intend no offense or disrespect to anyone. During the last session, lasting six months, there was not a single call of committees, nor during the session before the last, for that matter. There was therefore no opportunity to bring any matter before the House, unless it was made privileged by the rules, without first obtaining the consent of the Speaker to bring it up either by asking unanimous consent or under the suspension of the rules.

The privileged measures were so managed that one of them was always ready to be used to block anything that any Member sought to bring up. If the regular order had been called for, there was, as I remember, always a measure or measures on the calendar as unfinished business, the consideration of which could be made as interminable as the exigencies of the case required, which, under the rules, must be first disposed of before a call of committees would be in order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], in his speech on this subject near the close of the last session, reported on page 3836 of the RECORD, says:

> The Speaker must call the committees in their alphabetical order, and then the chairman of the committee which has the call is entitled to recognition by the Speaker as of right.

Thus leaving it to be inferred that this call must be made daily, or frequently. It is sufficient answer to this statement to simply state that during the second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress and the first session of the Sixtieth Congress the committees were not once called by the Speaker. To so interpret the rules and so manipulate the business of the House that a large majority of the business on the calendar can only be considered by unanimous consent or under suspension of the rules is to make the Speaker the censor, the master of the House and its membership, and enables him to set up his will and judgment and make it effective against not only the Member most interested, but against the majority of the House. At least he prevents the consideration of measures duly reported by committees, which the House might approve if it could get the opportunity to vote upon them.

Those who are opposed to any change in the present rules are fond of saying that no one can prevent a majority of the House from doing anything that it wishes to do. This sounds very well, and if it were true would be a complete answer to those who advocate a change in the rules. But in the sense in which it is meant to be understood the statement is not true. A legislative body having established rules for the government of its deliberations and the conduct of its business can consider matters only under and according to those rules; and when the effect of those rules is to delegate the powers and the judgment of the body in any given matter to its presiding officer, it can only act according to the will and judgment of such officer.

A majority of this House can not consider any matter except under the rules or by unanimous consent, and unanimous consent, at least under the present practice, can not even be asked unless the Speaker agrees beforehand to recognize the Member for the purpose of asking it. For example, let us suppose that a majority of this House desired to change some one or more of the present rules. This desire could only be put into effect by means of a report of the Committee on Rules or by the Speaker recognizing some Member to bring the question before the House independently of the committee. So that a majority could not, in the case mentioned, do what it wished to do.

I know that in claiming the right to deny recognition to Members to bring up matters that would otherwise be in order the present Speaker is only following precedents established by his predecessors, but I insist that no such authority is given, or ever has been given, the Speaker by any fair interpretation of the rules. It is so utterly repugnant to all ideas of fairness, equality, and independence that I am astonished when I think how many years the House of Representatives has quietly submitted to this unwarranted usurpation of power. The specious claim is made that the Speaker is a Member of the House and as such he has the same right as any other Member to object when unanimous consent is asked. Of course he has the same right to object as any other Member, but let him exercise that right, as other Members exercise it, from his place in the chair or on the floor, where his objection can be made a matter of record, instead of requiring the Members to come to his private room in order to ask of him as a favor what every Representative of a free people ought to insist upon as a right. I do not wish to be understood as asserting that the present Speaker has not exercised this authority to refuse recognition conscientiously nor that he has offensively denied recognition to Members. I am only claiming that no such authority exists under the rules, and that no self-respecting legislative body should tolerate the exercise of any such autocratic authority by its presiding officer, no matter how wise and just he may be, whether the rules permit it or not.

Those who defend the present system of organization and government of the House assert that the present rules were formulated in order to facilitate the expression of the will of the majority and to do away with the anarchy which formerly prevailed. They remind us that under the old rules a minority, or even one man, could set at naught the will of the majority of the House and prevent for days the transaction of important public business. We must stick to the present system, they say, or return to the old chaos. But such objections to amendments to the present rules are either made thoughtlessly or not in good faith. No one wants to return to the anarchy of the past. As we look back to the conduct of this body before Speaker Reed began to count a quorum and the obstreperous obstructions of a minority or a single Member were rendered impossible by a change of the rules, we wonder that such foolish chaos was suffered so long by the membership of the House of that day. Perhaps those farsighted men feared that the taking away of the power of initiative of the individual Member would have the effect of producing the present subservient, supine, and spineless condition of the membership of the House. These great men may have seen that anarchy in the House was to be preferred to the present inanition. In any case it seems to me clear that in trying to get away from anarchy the shapers of the destinies of the House of Representatives have gone far to the other extreme.

The modern office of Speaker of the House of Representatives is an anomaly; a constitutional monstrosity. The makers of the Constitution did not see fit to provide that he should even be a Member of the House, and would certainly have stood aghast at the mere suggestion that they were providing for the creation of an official who would have the sole power of determining what subjects of legislation the House of Representatives should consider. The only provision of the Constitution on the subject is as follows:

> The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers—

Clearly intending that the Speaker, like the clerk and other officers, should not be a Member, but a servant and employee of the House. For this reason the Constitution does not define and limit the powers and duties of the Speaker as it does the powers and duties of other officers of its creation. The Speaker has therefore no constitutional responsibility, and as he is elected for a definite term of two years, he is not under any direct responsibility to the House; at least, none that it can enforce without revolution.

I believe that the troubles complained of arise from the enormous and unconstitutional political power which the modern practice and rules of the House lodge in the Speaker; and the way to correct the wrongs which have grown up under this system and to restore to the membership of the House something of the power of initiative and independent action that the Constitution makers intended that they should have, and which in the earlier history of the House they had and exercised, is to take away from the Speaker the political power which has been gradually centering around his office.

Through the appointment of committees he affords the opportunity to Members to exercise their influence where, under the rules as they now exist, it will be most effective. Indeed, a Member of the House of Representatives is reduced nearly to a cipher unless he has a satisfactory committee appointment. These appointments are therefore eagerly sought by the membership of the House; and as political favors of this kind always confer great power upon any man that grants them and places those who receive these favors under obligations which most men recognize as binding, it is easy to discover the chief source of the power of the Speaker. Thus the Speaker of the House and those whom he chooses to help him control its legislation and conduct come into possession of the enormous power which enables them to do all the other things of which many of the people of the United States, I believe, justly complain.

As one result of this power we have daily the exhibition of Members who are on the programme of the Speaker being called up like schoolboys in a recitation to bring such matters before the House as they have rehearsed beforehand to the Speaker in his private apartments. To old Members this spectacle has become so common that they probably think nothing of it; but to new Members and to those who observe it from the gallery it is very significant of the condition to which the House has come, and to an American ought to bring regret, if not humiliation.

What I have already said probably sufficiently indicates the amendments to the present rules which I would propose. At the time of the adoption of the Reed rules but few amendments were necessary to revolutionize the practice of the House in the conduct of its business; so now only a few amendments appeal to me as necessary.

First, and more important than all the rest, I would take away from the Speaker the power to appoint the standing committees, which is not a legislative, but a political power; and I would have those committees appointed by a committee chosen from the various sections of the country for that purpose, and responsible directly to the men in each section who chose them and indirectly to the whole body of the House. Some such system is followed, I believe, by every parliamentary body in the world except this House; at least not one of them delegates to the presiding officer political power at all analogous to those exercised by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. I would also make this committee a committee on rules, which, when necessary, might suggest amendments of the rules to the House or bring in special rules for the consideration of particular bills in the manner in which the Committee on Rules now does. Such a committee would, in a measure, be like the ministers of Parliament or other legislative bodies, and would be directly responsible to the House, instead of, as now, being the creature of the Speaker.

Second. I would give a time when all so-called "minor bills" on either the Union or the House Calendar, and which have not the privilege that attaches to appropriation bills, bills for the raising of revenue, and a few others, should only be in order. For lack of some such rule matters of the highest importance to the people may go from Congress to Congress without an opportunity for consideration.

Third. I would also add to Rule XIV a provision that would prevent the presiding officer from refusing recognition to a Member who desires to bring up any matter which, under the rules, would be in order.

I believe that the adoption of these three amendments would so revolutionize the House of Representatives that it would be something of a deliberative body again; its Members would exhibit new life, and something of the virility of fifty years ago would be restored to it.

Membership in this House is an honor that may well be prized by any American citizen. I do not believe the average ability of its membership was ever higher than it is to-day, and the House and the country need to utilize all of this ability. Yet I think it will be generally admitted that the House has been declining in influence and power. Instead of being what the Constitution makers intended it to be, the most influential and powerful department of the Government, it has probably become the least important, and unless present conditions change must continue to sink into greater insignificance, both in real influence and in public estimation. For these conditions the membership and not the present occupant of the Speaker's chair is to blame. At least at the opening of each Congress the House could make any changes in the rules which it chose. Having this undoubted power, a membership which at the opening of each Congress puts its legislative head willingly into the yoke of bondage and keeps it there, thus robbing itself of power either to follow the dictates of its own judgment and conscience or to obey the wishes of the people, can not hope to long hold the respect of thinking men. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCCREARY].

Mr. MCCREARY. On yesterday afternoon I requested to have read a letter from a constituent of mine, Mr. W. S. Harvey, in which he denies certain charges that have been made against him by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. The reading of the communication was stopped by reason of some unparliamentary language in the letter. I desire to disclaim any personal association with it and regret very much that it should have been there. Before presenting the letter to be read I went over it and expurgated certain matters and supposed that I had expurgated all such matters, but this one slipped in unnoticed. I desire now to read in my time this letter from Mr. Harvey, the reading of which was stopped yesterday, as it is due to him:

NEW YORK, February 3, 1909.

DEAR SIR: On the 26th of January, in a speech in the House on the Panama Canal, Mr. RAINEY, of Illinois, referred at length to a proposal for the construction of a railroad and a proposal for the purchase of timber, which were under consideration by the Government of the Republic of Panama, and in that speech he referred to me by name as being one of those who are interested in what he calls "an infamous, outrageous scheme to despoil that country," and calls me and others "financial buccaneers."

At the time this speech was made I was out of the country on business and beyond reach of the telegraph. I have just returned and read the speech Mr. RAINEY made on the 26th of January, as well as his speech made on the 29th day of January, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. RAINEY said what he did in respect to myself and other gentlemen under the protection of his official position as a Member of Congress. As I am not able to refute his statements in the public manner in which he has made them, and as I am prevented from calling him to an account in the courts, also because of his official protection, I ask you to do me the favor of stating to Mr. RAINEY and to the Congress the facts as they exist in respect to my interest in these matters.

In his speech on January 26 Mr. RAINEY says:

> There is pending now in the General Assembly of Panama the most infamous railroad proposition ever submitted to any government.

After detailing the features of this railroad proposition, Mr. RAINEY then says:

> In addition to all this a group of American financiers is seeking to obtain possession of all the timber lands in the Republic of Panama on the Atlantic slope.

And in the next paragraph:

> These two schemes are proceeding with such absolute harmony * * * that I am driven to the conclusion they are being promoted by the same gentlemen.

In this manner Mr. RAINEY tries to confound those who may be interested in the railroad project with those interested in the timber project and to make it appear to the reader that the same parties are trying to put through both proposals.

I wish to say in the most positive manner that I know nothing whatever of this railroad project, nor have I any acquaintance with Mr. Randolph G. Ward or any person interested with him, nor have I ever had any correspondence with him or anyone else upon this or any other railroad project in Panama. I thus confirm the denial made by my secretary, Mr. J. F. Scott, during my absence, which denial Mr. RAINEY referred to on the 29th.

Mr. RAINEY, in speaking of the timber proposal, says:

> A group of American financiers is seeking to obtain possession of all the timber lands in the Republic of Panama on the Atlantic slope.

And he characterizes a little further on in his remarks this proposal as "an infamous, outrageous scheme," and calls the people who he names as being interested in this proposal "financial buccaneers."

I wish to say that I am interested in a proposal made to the Government of the Republic of Panama to purchase some of the standing timber on the wild and undeveloped lands situated on the Atlantic side of the Republic of Panama which belong to the Government of that country. This proposal is one to purchase on a stumpage basis, paying so much per 1,000 feet for such timber as is exported under the provisions of the contract. The prices to be paid for the various kinds of wood are clearly set forth in the contract, as are the terms and conditions of payment, which are quarterly payments in United States gold to the national treasury in the city of Panama.

I wish to most emphatically state that this contract was only and solely for the purchase of timber, and does not, in any manner or form, convey 1 acre of land in fee or under lease, or as a gift, to anyone, nor does it convey any rights or privileges of any kind whatsoever above or below ground, except such temporal rights of way as are necessary to get the timber from where it is out to the side of a vessel.

I wish to say that Mr. RAINEY's characterization of this proposal as "infamous and outrageous" was misleading, and I can not but question the sources of the gentleman's information and the integrity of those who advised him in preparing his speech; and I think he should have submitted with his remarks a copy of this timber contract for the inspection and judgment of his colleagues, which he might well have done, as this contract was published weeks ago in both the official and public journals in Panama, and was publicly known and as easily obtainable as the railroad contract which he did submit. I believe that Mr. RAINEY was misled into submitting a copy of the railroad contract without submitting a copy of the timber proposal, the effect of which has been to confound my association in the latter with the former, and to prejudice the minds of his associates in Congress. I challenge him or anyone else to point out in the timber proposal, as submitted to the Government of Panama, anything "infamous or outrageous," and in order that there may be no question as to the character of this contract, I submit to you with this comumnication a true copy of this document, with the letter that accompanied it to Señor Arango, minister of the Republic of Panama, and ask that they be published in the RECORD as a part of my statement.

Contrary to Mr. RAINEY's description in respect to the accessibility of the timber lands and the ease with which timber may be gotten out, I may say that the reverse is actually the case, as is well known to everyone who has traveled any distance away from the Canal Zone or who has studied the topography of the country. One of my associates, an expert timber man, spent nearly two years exploring the timber lands of Colombia, including what is now a part of the Republic of Panama. From his description I doubt if Mr. RAINEY ever was 5 miles away from the line of the Panama Railway.

There are but five possible ports, excepting the port of Colon, in 400 miles of Atlantic coast line, where vessels can safely lie and take on cargo. The timber fit for market grows in spots, mostly in the midst of jungles, as is the case in tropical climates, necessitating the covering of a good deal of very rough territory to obtain any considerable quantity of marketable logs.

In addition to this, it is an undetermined question as to what portion of what are called "inferior woods" of the Isthmus are suitable for use in northern climates. They have never heretofore had commercial value. In respect to some of them, it is known that they are worthless for use in the dry summer heat or colder temperature of the North, wherein they warp and check. If Mr. RAINEY's statements are correct that—a forest sought to be obtained by this concession ought to yield in the course of the next fifty years between $500,000,000 and $1,000,000,000—

he advances the strongest argument why the Republic of Panama should make this contract; for, excepting mahogany and cedar, for which high prices are paid the Republic (note price in contract), the largest part of the cost of timber is logging and stocking, which means getting it out so it can be shipped, all of which is labor, and the employment of labor means prosperity. The Republic of Panama, by the payments for stumpage and its people for labor, would be the principal recipient of this large sum.

The fact that the Panama Railroad Company, which has been operating on the Isthmus for some fifty years, and those in charge of the construction of the Panama Canal have never set up even a small sawmill to convert some of this immensely valuable timber which Mr. RAINEY describes into lumber for their local use, but have brought hundreds of shiploads from the farthest ends of the United States, would indicate that it is not so valuable as Mr. RAINEY sets forth or that it costs more to get it out than other timber can be imported for. The commercial value of all timber is determined by its geographical location in relation to other timber and the cost of getting it to market. Some timber would cost more than it would bring as manufactured product, and therefore has no commercial value so long as that condition exists, which has been the condition in Panama, with the exception of the cabinet woods.

In connection with this project, Mr. RAINEY, in his speech, says that at a conference of some members of the assembly held on Sunday night, December 27, at the presidencia in Panama, and in response to a question, President Obaldia stated that the parties who were back of this proposal were William Nelson Cromwell, Roger L. Farnham, W. S. Harvey, and Charles P. Taft. I wish to characterize this statement by Mr. RAINEY as unfounded and undoubtedly based on misinformation furnished to him. I have never had any connection directly or indirectly with Mr. William Nelson Cromwell or Mr. Charles P. Taft in respect to this timber proposal or any other proposal of any sort in the Republic of Panama, nor have either of these gentlemen, directly or indirectly, the remotest interest with me in this timber proposal. This denial of business relations with Mr. Cromwell in connection with the Republic of Panama is in no way to be construed as a "repudiation of him and his methods," for I hold him in the highest esteem and appreciate, as all should, his patriotic altruism. The parties associated with me in this matter are those named in the proposal as well as some other influential men identified with lumber interests in the United States.

What I particularly wish to state respecting Mr. RAINEY's statement that at the presidencia President Obaldia or John Ehrman, who is the authorized representative on the Isthmus of myself and associates, told the assemblymen that the parties behind this scheme were William Nelson Cromwell, Roger L. Farnham, Charles P. Taft, and W. S. Harvey, is absolutely incorrect, and Mr. RAINEY must have been very badly misinformed, for I call your attention, and that of the Members of Congress, to copies of two cables which I submit herewith, one from President Obaldia and one from John Ehrman, in which the former states that neither he nor anyone else at the meeting referred to, or at any other time, mentioned the names of William Nelson Cromwell, Charles P. Taft, and Roger L. Farnham as being connected with the timber proposal; and Ehrman states that he was not present at all at the meeting and never elsewhere mentioned the names of those three men in connection with the timber proposal.

Mr. RAINEY states that the assemblymen at the meeting referred to demanded to know the names of the parties whom Ehrman was acting for, because the assemblymen represented that John Ehrman had no particular financial standing. I wish to say that John Ehrman is a partner in the banking firm of Ehrman & Co., one of the oldest banking houses in Panama, with prominent European, American, and oriental banking connections, and he is a man of large wealth and of the highest standing in Panama. He is about the last man in Panama whose financial responsibility would be questioned by anyone.

Respecting Mr. Farnham's apparent connection with this matter, I wish to state I personally have conducted negotiations in this proposed contract, first, with Mr. Obaldia, when he was minister in Washington, and subsequently with Mr. Arango, who succeeded Mr. Obaldia as Panama minister in Washington.

In the meantime my expert associate, who had visited Panama and was well acquainted on the Isthmus, having died, I did on two occasions ask Mr. R. L. Farnham, whom I have known for a number of years and who was going to the Isthmus on business, to secure for me any data or information that would be of assistance to me and my associates in preparing our proposal. This was in the nature of a friendly request, without compensation, and saved me a personal trip to the Isthmus. This was what Mr. Farnham did, and I desire to call your attention to a letter by Señor Valdez, a member of President Obaldia's cabinet, written on January 1, 1909, published in the Panama papers, and submitted by Mr. RAINEY, in which Mr. Valdez refers to Mr. Farnham's connection with the case:

Those interested in this business for the purchase of timber are Messrs. W. S. Harvey, Alfred E. Drake, and Jonas E. Whitley, of the United States. Mr. Farnham had no part in this business, so far as I know, and there is no reason whatever to consider him as the attorney or representative of the gentlemen just named, because they have never accredited him as such before the President of Panama nor before any other functionary of this Republic.

Respecting the statement of Doctor Amador in a letter, copy of which was submitted by Mr. RAINEY, to the effect that Mr. Farnham urged him to sign this contract: At my request Mr. Farnham did have one interview with Doctor Amador, whom he met in Paris. He had no possible reason to ask him to sign the contract, for the good reason that at that time the contract was not definitely outlined. I had asked Mr. Farnham to learn for me the views which Doctor Amador had in respect to the incorporation in the proposed contract of a clause permitting and encouraging immigration onto the lands of the Republic during the operation of the cutting of the timber, in order that agricultural development might be encouraged.

I wish to quote further from a letter of Mr. Valdez, as heretofore referred to, in which he says:

The reports that I have of Messrs. Harvey, Drake, and Whitley agree in establishing the fact that they are all persons of honor and exquisite culture and unimpeachable reputation, which fact is corroborated with respect to Drake by the very respectful tone in which he alludes in his letter to our ex-President.

For this reason Señor Obaldia, who knows the public and private morality of these parties and knows that not one of them is capable of corrupting anyone nor going into illegal or censurable affairs, has become offended with the malicious report that they attempted to bribe Doctor Amador; and in one of his letters to him, of which I have made mention above, he rejects with severity this foolish assertion.

I have had the honor and pleasure of meeting Señor Obaldia a number of times, and have been greatly and most favorably impressed with him as a gentleman not only of great culture, but of the very highest standards of commercial integrity. His broad, comprehensive appreciation of the interests and welfare of his country and his patriotic determination to protect, conserve, and perpetuate its natural resources, which he believed the proposed contract would do, commanded my admiration and enlisted my earnest cooperation.

On January 9 I sent the following cable to President Obaldia:

President OBALDIA, Panama:

Regret to read in newspapers of opposition based upon misunderstanding of timber contract. Feel sure opponents do not realize benefits to Republic without any surrender by the Republic of right or title to lands.

W. S. HARVEY.

After learning of the vicious attack being made upon President Obaldia on January 12, I cabled him as follows:

President OBALDIA, Panama:

Our proposal is most fair, but to relieve your administration of difficulties we will, if desired, withdraw proposal, as we decline to compete with obstructive or blackmailing bidders.

WILLIAM S. HARVEY, Trustee.

On January 13 I received the following cable:

W. S. HARVEY, New York:

I thank you for your cablegram. It is not yet time to desist. Assembly will decide upon contract. Inhabitants Atlantic coast favorable. You caused me no difficulties. I work for the welfare of my country and must oppose the obstructionists. I will approve the contract that best consults the interests of the public.

OBALDIA.

This timber contract that proposes to buy from the Republic of Panama and pay quarterly in gold coin a full market price for timber that is of known value, and to endeavor to create a market for timber that heretofore has had no value, will be of great benefit and advantage to the Republic of Panama. The forests will in no way be denuded. The conditions of the contract require that the timber shall be cut according to the best-known methods of the Forest Service of the United States and Germany, and under the supervision of forest experts.

I sincerely trust you will use your influence to have the Congress of the United States purge itself of even the appearance of approval of the actions of one of its Members, who, by his reflections upon citizens of his own country and also upon the President of a friendly Republic, discredits the distinguished body whose reputation he should jealously guard.

Respectfully, yours,

WM. S. HARVEY.

PANAMA, January 31, 1909.

MANUEL OBALDIA,
Hotel Latham, New York:

I was not present at conference at Presidencia December 27; therefore have never made statement to Deputados relating to parties interested in timber proposition who have no connection with Charles Taft, Cromwell, or Farnham, so I have never mentioned them to anybody.

JUAN EHRMAN.

[Copy of cable.]

JANUARY 21, 1909.

MANUEL OBALDIA,
Hotel Latham, New York:

My attitude while in Colombian Congress in 1903 and my entire public life are far beyond the reach of slanderers. Amador Arias's government was not overthrown, but after expiration of constitutional term was defeated in free elections, which freedom of suffrage was due to the presence of the Americans at polls, especially invited to do so by Amador Arias's government, as it is shown by official communication published and in accordance with article 136 of Panamanian constitution. At conference at Presidencia December 27 were present the members of the cabinet and 17 deputados; neither Ehrman nor any other outsider was present, and no mention was ever made by me or by any other person of Charles Taft, Cromwell, or Farnham in regard to timber proposition which was brought before them for consideration. Railway proposition presented by Ward to Assembly was considered and rejected. Assembly passed a law authorizing to construct railroads with public funds, said roads to be national property. Timber contract with Ehrman was rejected by Assembly, and there is a bill under consideration regulating forest exploitation on the Atlantic coast between Rive Concepcion and Costa Rica, excluding the entire Chagres Valley.

OBALDIA.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to incorporate also in the RECORD the letter accompanying the contract and the contract referred to in the letter which I have just read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter and contract are as follows:

LETTER ACCOMPANYING CONTRACT.

100 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY,
August 24, 1908.

Señor J. A. ARANGO,
Minister from the Republic of Panama to the United States, Washington, D. C.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: On behalf of myself and my associates, I beg to hand you herewith a proposal of purchase of the timber upon a portion of the public lands of your Republic, with a request that it receive your careful attention and, in case it meets with your approval, as we trust it may, that you transmit it officially to your Government, at Panama, with such commendation as you can consistently accord to it.

In preparing the proposition, we have steadily borne in mind that any such transaction as the one we contemplate, to be successful, must be framed so as to yield well-balanced beneficial results for both parties to the undertaking, and have endeavored so to arrange.

Your country's timber, which has lain in luxuriant forest waste for centuries, is a great natural heritage of large value, which, it is believed, can be converted into an annual revenue-producing asset for your national treasury that will increase from year to year; but this can not be done except by the most intelligent, skillful, experienced effort and administration. Our proposal is not a request for a concession, but a direct offer to purchase outright, making prompt and regular payments, from which an income would result in the near future, to continue in perpetuity.

The work of cutting would be conducted under the direction of qualified experts in forestry, and would afford steady and congenial employment, at good wages, to a large agricultural class of native labor, who would thus be brought in immediate contact with progressive men and methods. The Government of Panama would secure a great advantage through this cutting of timber, as a large portion of its territory, which is at present of no value for either cattle raising or agriculture, would be cleaned, ready for use for such purposes and for the establishment of homesteads and village centers.

Another important consideration is the probability that in clearing the lands of undergrowth and timber, rich mineral deposits, now unknown and impossible to locate, will be uncovered, and thereby made an additional source of revenue to the Republic.

In the timber tracts selected undergrowth that has no value must be removed to get at what we regard as merchantable material, for which, when cut and transported to the seacoast, markets must be created and developed in this and other countries. With this in mind, we have offered exceptional prices for the higher grade of woods with established values, in fact, several times as much per 1,000 feet as is realized by the Nicaraguan Government from a standing concession which provides for the payment of a fixed sum annually for a monopoly in cutting mahogany and cedar.

For the enormous quantities of timber, of little or no value at present, that have stood for ages without attracting capital for development and use, we offer prices that are equal to those paid for better-known varieties in other countries nearer than yours to the United States. For instance, in Mexico, within 135 miles by railroad of Mexico City, we can purchase large tracts covered with pine and oak timber at prices lower than we herein offer for the inferior varieties of woods standing in the public lands of your country; and, in anticipation of a possible increase in value in the future, after we have made a market, we have provided that prices shall be subject to revision after a term of years.

To develop profitable markets and use for the timber to be cut and exported requires an intimate knowledge of the world's lumber conditions, also an association of capital and facilities of large magnitude, which will be furnished.

The establishment of plants in your country to provide facilities for the handling of the timber will also require large outlay.

The quantities of timber cut and to be paid for, it is proposed, shall be verified by a class of government officials to be created, and paid good salaries from the revenues which this important industry will produce.

Too much importance can not be attached to the enormous benefit to accrue to the Republic of Panama from the adoption through our organization of modern scientific methods of operating which result in the practical perpetuation of the forest supply and the preservation of an asset of almost incalculable value.

After years of indifference our country has become earnestly alive to the value of our forests, and the policy now in force is producing an income that is rapidly increasing.

There will be associated with those making this offer some of the most experienced men in the United States who are indentified in an influential way with the timber and lumber trade of the United States, whose efforts have done much to arouse public sentiment in favor of conserving our national and state forests for both the beneficent and financial results that will follow.

This proposal is made by us, acting in the capacity of three trustees, to facilitate the execution of the conditions of the purchase, as this undertaking requires the joint association of men with the capital, experience, and particular equipment and machinery for cutting and shipping the timber—men with sawmills at tide-water ports in the United States and lumber dealers who supply builders and consumers. Those who will be associated in this enterprise are men identified with all the above branches of the timber and lumber business and who control ample capital and every facility to carry it on successfully.

I trust that this summary statement of our purpose and the benefits to follow from an acceptance of our offer will commend themselves to your favorable attention, and beg to place at your disposal any further information we possess and to offer any service you may require to make the business proposed acceptable to you and your Government.

Kindly accept this expression of my appreciation of your courtesy and attention, and believe me, Very truly, yours, WM. S. HARVEY, Trustee.

For—
WM. S. HARVEY,
119 South Fourth street, Philadelphia, Pa.,
ALFRED E. DRAKE,
24 State street, New York, N. Y.,
JONAS E. WHITLEY,
25 Broad street, New York, N. Y.,
Acting as Trustees.

CONTRACT.

The Messrs. William S. Harvey, Alfred E. Drake, and Jonas E. Whitley, citizens of the United States, with offices in the city of New York, and acting as trustees of the interests of themselves and associates, having proposed to the Government of the Republic of Panama to buy from the said Government all of the natural forest timber of whatever variety, growing on the lands or public domain belonging to the Republic of Panama, in the several Provinces of Bocas del Toro, Chiriqui, Veraguas, Panama, and Colon;

The Government of the Republic of Panama, being desirous of deriving a substantial and regular income from its vast forests, which at present yield no revenue,

Does, therefore, on this — day of ———, 1908, through and by its proper and qualified officers, acting in accordance with the laws of the Republic of Panama, and having full authority thereunder, make and enter into this contract with and hereby sells to the said William S. Harvey, Alfred E. Drake, and Jonas E. Whitley, all of the natural forest timber, of whatever variety (excepting rubber, cacao, and dyewoods), growing upon all the lands at this date belonging to the Government of the Republic of Panama in the Provinces of Bocas del Toro, Chiriqui, Veraguas, Panama, and Colon (excepting such of the territory as is included in the Canal Zone), and embraced between the coast of the Caribbean Sea and the top of the parallel divide, including to the headwaters of all the streams and rivers in all of the above-named Provinces flowing into the Caribbean Sea, upon the following terms and conditions:

First. (a) The Government of the Republic of Panama (hereinafter called "the Government") hereby concedes to the said William S. Harvey, Alfred E. Drake, and Jonas E. Whitley (hereinafter called "the trustees"), full power to assign, sell, lease, make over, and convey to a company or companies, party or parties, all or any part of the rights, benefits, and privileges by the said trustees possessed by and under this contract; without, however, relinquishing or relieving in any respect or degree the direct obligation of said trustees to make to the Government the payments, as prescribed in article 3 hereof, for all timber and lumber exported by either the trustees, their agents, or assigns.

(b) To enable the trustees, their agents or assigns, to cut and export the timber by them purchased under this contract of sale, the Government hereby grants to the said trustees, their agents or assigns, a continuous period of fifty-two years from the date of the signing and execution of this contract of sale, in, and during which period of time the trustees, or their agents, or assigns, shall proceed to cut and remove from all the public lands at this date existing in all of the territory specified and described in the foregoing paragraph, all the forest timber purchased by them under the terms of this contract; the trustees, on their part, hereby agree to commence, as soon as possible after the execution of this contract, the exploration work necessary to getting machinery and plant on the ground, preliminary to the actual cutting and exportation of the forest timber purchased, and the trustees further agree to begin, or cause to be begun, under penalty of cancellation of this contract, such actual cutting and exportation of said timber within a period of not to exceed two years from the date of this contract, and to continue diligently thereafter the cutting and removal of all the timber thus purchased.

Second. As a valuable consideration and in part payment for the forest timber which they purchase under this contract, the trustees agree, at their expense, to furnish to the Government constantly during the continuance of this contract, the services of one or two forest experts who, acting for the Government, shall supervise and see that all cutting of timber done by the trustees or their agents or assigns shall be in accordance with the methods adopted by the Governments of the United States and Germany for the profitable utilization and practical perpetuation of the said forest resources so far as conditions and climate permit.

Third. (a) In addition to this service for the utilization and perpetuation of the forests which the trustees bind themselves, in article 2 hereof, to furnish the Government as part compensation for the forest timber purchased by them, the trustees hereby agree to pay into the treasury of the Republic of Panama for mahogany and cedar the sum of $15 per thousand feet (board measure), and for all other woods of whatever variety the sum of 25 cents per thousand feet (board measure), for each and every thousand feet of such timber which the trustees, or their agents, may export from the country under this contract.

(b) It is understood by and agreed between the Government and the trustees that these prices, as set forth above, to be paid by the trustees to the Government, shall remain unchanged for a continuous period of ten years from the date of the commencement of exportation of the timber cut under this contract.

(c) At the expiration of such period of ten years the price then to be paid by the trustees to the Government shall be: For mahogany and cedar, $20 per thousand feet (board measure); for nispero and for maria, $1.50 per thousand feet (board measure); and for all other woods, 75 cents per thousand feet (board measure) for each and every thousand feet (board measure) exported by the trustees or their agents or assigns under this contract; and these prices shall remain unchanged for the continuous period of fifteen years immediately following the first foregoing period of ten years.

(d) At the expiration of this second period of fifteen years, which will be the end of the twenty-fifth year of the fifty-two years of the life of this contract, the prices to be thereafter, and until the conclusion of this contract, paid by the trustees to the Government for each and every thousand feet (board measure) exported by the trustees or their agents or assigns under this contract shall be, for mahogany and cedar, $30 per thousand feet (board measure), and for all the other woods the price to be paid shall be double the price fixed for each thousand feet (board measure) of such wood, for the preceding period of fifteen years.

Fourth. The trustees hereby agree that the reports of the amount of timber or lumber exported by them, or their agents or assigns, shall be verified by competent inspectors, appointed and paid by the Government for that purpose, and whose duties are to verify, by the established rules now used in the United States for measuring logs and lumber, all such exports of logs or lumber, and when shipped in full cargoes to verify the tonnage of all vessels used by the trustees, or their agents or assigns, for carrying said logs or lumber.

Fifth. The trustees hereby agree to accept these verified reports as the basis for payment, in accordance with the provisions of article 3 of this contract, by the trustees to the Government for all the timber or lumber exported by the trustees or their agents or assigns under this contract; and further agree to make all such payments in gold coin of the United States or the equivalent in money of the Republic of Panama, at the office of the treasurer of the Republic in the city of Panama on or before the 25th day of the month succeeding each period of three months of the calendar year.

Sixth. The Government hereby agrees to make no other contracts or concessions for the cutting of timber on any of the public lands embraced in the territory included in this contract during the life of this contract; also, the Government agrees to protect the trustees in all their rights thereunder against any and all encroachments on the same, and without cost to the trustees.

Seventh. The trustees and their agents or assigns are not required to pay, and hereby are relieved from the payment of, any national, departmental, or municipal taxes or duties of any sort whatsoever during the operation of this contract; the payments by the trustees to the Government, as set forth in article 3 of this contract, being in lieu of any and all of such taxes or duties.

Eighth. The trustees and their agents or assigns may import into the Republic of Panama, without duty or other charges of any kind, such machinery, tools, steamboats or power boats, and other equipment and supplies necessary to the conduct of its business and maintenance of its employees, and also the trustees and their agents or assigns are hereby granted the right, without tax or hindrance, to make use of and to have the right of way over any and all of the public lands and any and all streams and waterways for the utilization or for transportation by cable, tramway, sluiceway, flumes, barges, tugs, rafts, or otherwise of the timber and lumber cut by the trustees, or their agents or assigns, under this contract.

Ninth. If, after the commencement of actual shipments of lumber by the trustees, or their agents or assigns, all operations are suspended for a continuous period of twelve months, the trustees hereby agree to pay to the Government a sum equal to the Government's yearly average income from the proceeds of this contract of sale of timber for the years during which said contract has been operative; and should any payment so due not be made within twelve months after such payment falls due, such default may be deemed by the Government an abandonment of this contract, and the same may then be declared by the Government null and void: Provided, however, that such suspension of operation be not caused by a revolution or civil or foreign war involving the Republic of Panama, in which case such suspension will not be a cause for cancellation of this contract.

Tenth. The trustees hereby agree that if, at any time during their operations under this contract, their employees or agents or assigns, or agents' or assigns' employees, uncover or discover any mine or mineral deposit, of whatever kind or character, on the lands belonging to the Government, such mine or deposit shall be recognized as the property of the Government, and in no wise included in this contract of sale; and that whenever and immediately any such discovery of mine or mineral deposit be made, all details of such discovery, together with the location of the same, shall be communicated by the trustees or their agents to the proper officials of the Government at Panama: It is provided, however, and mutually agreed, that in the event of any and every such discovery of a mine or mineral deposit, the trustees shall have the first option to purchase or lease the same from the Government, in accordance with the mining laws of the Republic of Panama.

Eleventh. The trustees hereby express their understanding and agreement that this contract to buy, cut, and export the timber growing on the lands belonging to the Government in the several provinces named in this contract, gives to the trustees no title in fee to any of said public lands, or right to occupy any portion of such public lands as the Government may, from time to time, allot or sell to actual settlers for bona fide occupation for agricultural purposes, for a longer time than may be necessary to cut and remove the timber therefrom, or to impede immigration to portions of the public lands so allotted or sold. On its part, the Government hereby agrees that any allotment or sale hereafter made by it of any portion of its public forest lands to actual settlers shall not interfere with or prevent the trustees, or their agents or assigns, from cutting and removing the timber growing on any such public forest lands so allotted or sold, but now included under this contract, it being recognized that one of the principal objects of the Government in making this contract is to have some of its public forest lands cleared, in order that such land, now useless, may be made valuable and of use for the purposes of settlement and agriculture.

Twelfth. In the event of any dispute or difference of any and every kind arising between the trustees and the Government or its officials, or between the trustees and any citizen of the Republic of Panama, which can not equitably and satisfactorily be adjusted by arbitration, the trustees hereby agree to submit the same for adjudication to the proper courts of the Republic of Panama.

The following amendments were suggested to Mr. John Ehrman by various members of the general assembly:

1. It is desired that during the two years for studies, etc., at least five stations for the cutting of timber be fully installed.

2. A clause is to be inserted granting the inhabitants of the region where the timber is sold the right of transit through the grounds worked by the company, and also the liberty for those inhabitants to use the timber necessary for their buildings and domestic services as it is heretofore used.

3. That the list of hard woods be increased of some left out in yours.

4. That commissary departments, if established, are to sell their goods for money and not with coupons.

5. That the price of 25 cents United States gold per 1,000 feet of soft wood in the first years be raised to 35 cents United States gold per 1,000 feet.

6. That the improvements made, as roads, railroads, buildings, wharves, etc., be left free of charge to the Republic of Panama at the end of the contract.

7. That all goods imported, except machinery and tools, are to pay the regular national importation tax—10 per cent ad valorem.

Which changes John Ehrman was instructed by the trustees to make, as follows:

Trustees agree to No. 1, with exception of word "fully," which is too indefinite, as they must determine character of plants in each situation. Trustees accept Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 6. Respecting No. 5, they can not advance price named in contract, because it is same as they now pay for same class woods elsewhere better located. Respecting No. 7, they object to it as written. They will accept in its place the following: The trustees, their agents or assigns, shall pay the regular national tax of 10 per cent ad valorem on all their importations of food supplies, dry goods, wearing apparel, jewelry, perfumery, tobacco, and liquors. Present form of contract must be preserved as submitted, and the changes as herein agreed to must follow article 12 as addenda to contract.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am now ready to yield thirty-five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON]. The gentleman from Kansas informs me that he does not care to consume the time. I promised also to yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER], to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE], to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. None of these gentlemen being present, I will now yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS].

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, last year the question was before the House of whether a change should be made in this Hall, and the House adopted a resolution directing that a report be made. The report was made and is now printed and is in the document room, and I presume that we will soon be called upon to take some action upon it. In that connection I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article giving in detail the system of ventilation in the British House of Commons. It is chapter 12, of "Memories of Eight Parliaments," by Lucy (Toby, M. P.). The chapter is entitled "The lungs of the House of Commons." It gives a very complete account of the ventilating system there, said to be the best system of any parliamentary house in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, do I understand from the gentleman from New York that the article he desires to be printed is in reference to the ventilation of public buildings?

Mr. PARSONS. No; the House of Commons.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I was in hopes the gentleman would take up the question of the ventilation of this building, and I would be glad that he or some other gentleman would introduce in this House a resolution that would open the doors around the galleries in this Hall and also some of the outside windows, so that we could have proper ventilation in this Chamber. If the gentleman would introduce a resolution of that kind, I do not think there would be a dissenting voice on this floor.

Mr. PARSONS. I think if the gentleman will read this extract which I will insert in the RECORD he will see that a much more elaborate system than he suggests will be necessary to meet the question of the ventilation of this Hall.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think, instead of ventilating this Chamber by going half of a quarter of a mile away and pumping air into the building through a tunnel, the practical, sensible thing would be to open the doors, or part of them, in the galleries and raise the outside windows, as they do all over the country, and ventilate this room from the outside, as we do at our residences and other public buildings.

Mr. PARSONS. In the system there they do not go a half a mile away.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We have to go one-half of a quarter of a mile away from here to get the air that we breathe in this room. We should get it direct from the outside.

Mr. PARSONS. They pump in from the outside and pass it through several passageways, and then it comes through the floor, which is made of iron gratings, and the air is passed up through these iron gratings, and then on the floor there is a matting. On some of these iron gratings, in warm weather, there are blocks of ice placed, so that the air is cooled as it comes through. There is no draft, because there is, first, this iron grating, and then this matting over the grating.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it would be much cheaper and better in a great hall of this character to let the outer windows and the doors around the galleries and the outside windows be opened, so as to allow the fresh air to enter directly from the outside, instead of getting it as we now do through a tunnel several hundred feet away from the building?

Mr. PARSONS. I do; and I think the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds has recommended that if a change is made, the Hall be placed as near as possible to the outer wall, so that we will have ventilation from the outside, but that of itself will not be sufficient and will not work in cold weather——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand, but——

Mr. PARSONS. The draft would be too great.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand, but a great deal of the time we are here we have warm weather, and we will be here during the coming extra session, soon to be called, and probably we will have a good deal of warm weather, political and otherwise, and we should provide for sensible ventilation by opening the doors and windows around this Hall.

Mr. PARSONS. By the ventilating system of the British House of Commons the temperature is kept below 70° all the time.

The article referred to is as follows:

CHAPTER XII. THE LUNGS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

That the House of Commons is the chamber with the best acoustical properties among its compeers is indisputable. Personally, with an experience exceeding that of most members, I hold it to be also the best ventilated. This is a controversial point governed by idiosyncrasies. It is an old story, going back to a date beyond thirty years, how John Bright and Acton Smee Ayrton, sitting side by side on the treasury bench during the last years of Mr. Gladstone's great administration born in 1868, used to squabble over the temperature. While one declared it was intolerably cold, the other protested it was insufferable by reason of heat.

Doctor Percy, then in charge of the ventilating machinery, was the recipient of angry letters from both statesmen. Ayrton was at the time first commissioner of works, and spent an appreciable portion of a useful, strenuous life in prowling round, closing up the air openings of the chamber. "Mr. Ayrton was very susceptible to drafts," Mr. Prim, resident clerk of the works in the ventilation department of the Houses of Parliament, subsequently resident engineer, confided to the select committee meeting in 1892. Mr. Bright yearned for fresh air, from whatsoever quarter it came. Thus it came to pass that as they sat together watching the decadence of Gladstone's once vigorous ministry, a coolness literally sprang up between the president of the board of trade and the first commissioner of works.

It is this difference in the temperature of statesmen and less important mortals that harries the life of those responsible for the ventilation of the House of Commons. What is one man's fresh air is another man's dangerous draft, leading to rheumatism and other direful consequences. The normal temperature of the House of Commons is, with infinite care and at considerable cost to the nation, kept at the level of 62°. That is the ideal temperature for healthy human beings. But so devotional is the care with which the priceless health and comfort of members are watched over that varying circumstance leads to altered temperature. The thermometer is consulted every hour, the result being recorded in a book that will never be published. The inquiry is no mere slapdash performance. Nothing is dealt with haphazard. An able-bodied man passes a useful life in perambulating the chamber and its precincts, thermometer in hand, testing the temperature. No member coming upon him by chance guesses his kindly errand. He may be seen flitting behind the Speaker's chair at one end of the House, presently skirting the chair of the sergeant-at-arms at the other, anxiously watching the thermometer and entering the record. Thence his parade leads him to the division lobbies, the retiring rooms, the outer lobbies, and all the places where members congregate. His report is, hour by hour, carried to the clerk of the works, who, with a speed and decision unknown in committee of supply, deals accordingly with the ventilating apparatus.

I have mentioned the fact that the normal temperature aimed at is 62°. Having made profound study of human nature, the experts in charge of the ventilation of the House recognize that with a temperature of 80° in the shade outside, members entering the chamber where it stood at 62° would feel it chilly. Accordingly, in such exceptional circumstances, the temperature is nicely graduated, going up to 65° or higher. The same infinite care watches over an all-night sitting. This divertissement taking place on a sultry summer night, a temperature of 62° is a luxury. With the dawn of early morning healthy animal nature grows chilly. The temperature of the chamber is, accordingly, delicately doctored until, as far as possible, the anxious expert raises it to about the average of the blood heat of an Irish or Welsh member.

In no other legislative assembly in the world is equal solicitude in the important matter of ventilation shown for the comfort of members. The extreme radical will feel some satisfaction in knowing that it is not extended to the House of Lords. The difference between the atmosphere of the two chambers is strikingly disclosed on the rare occasions when the lords sit late, carrying on debate in a crowded house. Ventilation is attempted by the vulgar process of opening windows. How ineffective this proves by comparison with the scientific, elaborate mechanism controlling ventilation in the House of Commons is brought home to the member leaving his own house to sit for a while in the gallery overlooking the peers. The air of cities contains an average of four volumes of carbonic acid per 10,000. In an ordinary room the ventilation is regarded as satisfactory as long as the proportion of carbonic acid in the atmosphere does not exceed six volumes per 10,000. The House of Commons, with some 350 people breathing its atmosphere, rarely exceeds four volumes, equivalent to breathing the fresh air outside. This simple matter of fact is a triumphant vindication of the success of its ventilation.

Doctors are agreed on the point that supply of fresh air should reach the proportions of 50 cubic feet per minute per head. That ideal is habitually exceeded in the House of Commons. Members who, like the oldest clubman, must grumble about something, complain that while the air is abundant it lacks freshness, inducing a feeling of lassitude. In fairness to the painstaking staff of the ventilation department, it should be pointed out that this incontestable condition of constant attendance upon parliamentary debate is due not to lack of freshness in the air supplied, but to the prodigious length of some speeches. As an incentive to a state of physical and mental lassitude, an hour's discourse from certain members is equal to an increment of carbonic acid in the atmosphere of one volume per 10,000.

Two years ago careful experiments were carried out with desire to ascertain to what extent bacteria frequent the house. The results were curious—on the whole satisfactory. For reasons which members familiar with its occupants may determine, the worst quarter of the house was, oddly enough, the bench immediately behind that on which His Majesty's ministers sit. As the result of 10 experiments made with infinite care, it was demonstrated that here bacteria revelled in proportion of 87 per cent, while the corresponding bench on the opposite side revealed the presence of only 65 per cent of undesirable visitors. On the back bench on the government side the record ran as low as 57 per cent. Compared, as was done in the select committee's report, with such representative congregations of innocents as gather in the town schools of Aberdeen and Dundee, where mechanical ventilation is in use, this incursion of microbes in the ministerial stronghold is exceptionally high. The organisms were different in form. Happily, in no case was discovery made of the presence of any recognized as the cause of specific infectious diseases in man.

The unique privileges of members of the House of Commons in respect of ventilation are secured by elaborate and costly machinery. When, after the destruction of the Houses of Parliament by fire in 1834, the structure was rebuilt, special attention was devoted to the subject. Doctor Reid, the highest authority of the day, was intrusted with the care of this department. The process adopted by him was primarily based on the use of gigantic fans, which drove fresh air into the chamber. While the supply of fresh air was an article of faith, the presence of a constant draft was a matter of fact. In this initial stage the main principle underlying the ventilation of the chamber of to-day was adopted. Air was driven into the chamber through the grating of the floor. Members, ever complaining, protested, with some reason, that while by this primitive process they were chilled in winter and scorched in summer, such air as was provided was served up strongly impregnated with pounded grit and road metal. A tradition lingers round this epoch, showing how a long-suffering member secretly provided himself with a piece of paper freshly gummed. This, in the presence of sympathetic witnesses, he attached to one of the seats. On examination at the close of the sitting the paper was found to be covered with particles of fine dust projected by the ventilating apparatus. This was conclusive. Doctor Reid and his system disappeared from Westminster.

After brief interval he was succeeded by Sir Goldsworthy Gurney, who, doing away with the primitive fans, adapted the principle familiar in collieries of a furnace at the base of an upcast. Doctor Percy, following Sir Goldsworthy in care of the ventilating apparatus, maintained this principle, and with one or two improvements it is in practice at this day.

The machinery is subterraneous. There are many more vaults betwixt the foundations of Westminster Palace and the floor of the House of Commons than is dreamt of in the philosophy of honorable members. Under the Octagon Hall lurks a vault whence the supply of air for the debating chamber is drawn. Through doors and windows overlooking the river the balmy breeze of the Thames is indrawn.

This arrangement is accountable for an episode, threatening at the outset, farcial in the conclusion, that marked the reign of Mr. David Plunket (now Lord Rathmore) at the board of works. One sultry summer night, the house being exceptionally crowded in anticipation of a division, his private room was stormed by a mob of alarmed and angry members. Even as the door opened to admit them the first commissioner was conscious of a pestilential smell. This evidence confirmed their complaint that the corridors, the reading room, the dining room, and, to a modified extent, the lobby were permeated by malodor. The conclusion was obvious. Something had gone wrong with the drains, and the health of honorable and right honorable members was in dire peril.

Mr. Plunket hastily summoned to consultation the chief engineers and the heads of his staff. Hurried examination was made of the sanitary apparatus, without detecting a flaw. Even as the anxious work went forward the plague abated. The normal condition of the sedulously purified atmosphere was steadily, with increased rapidity, reasserting itself. The harried first commissioner, going onto the terrace with intent to cool his heated brow, came upon the heart of the mystery. Just passing the end of the terrace, slowly making its way with the tide up the river, was a stately barge, with high deck load of fresh manure meant for riverside gardens. Drifting at slow pace past the terrace of the House of Commons, the evening breeze, blowing off the heap, filled the ventilating bins with delectable air. Hence the scare.

The progress of the indraft is intercepted by a broad expanse of falling water, through which the air must needs pass, leaving behind it possible particles of undesirable dust. Inside the chamber are a couple of shafts worked by a large pair of wheels, which drive the air into what looks like a colossal corn bin. This is a chamber 8 feet high, extending the full breadth of the vault, a distance of 13 feet. Inside this bin is a movable close-fitting shutter, which travels backward and forward. As it is pushed forward the air in the bin, having no other means of escape, passes upward through a funnel into another chamber prepared for its reception. The closely fitting shutter advancing leaves a vacuum behind, into which the outer air comes rushing, in time to find itself driven upward by return of the relentless shutter.

Thus through the long night, while tongues wag above, the almost silent shutter moves backward and forward, crushing the newly come air out of the bin, only to find that a fresh supply has entered on the other side, making constant discovery that if the bin is to be emptied there is yet another journey to make.

The air thus dexterously trapped breathes itself out from the upper bin into a gallery, along which it courses till it finds itself under the legislative chamber. Thirty feet above the lights of the house shine, twinkling through the close iron grating of the floor. It is so silent down there that one can distinctly hear the voice of the honorable member addressing the chair. Climbing a series of steep iron ladders the explorer comes upon a succession of gratings on which stand blocks of ice. Coursing round these the ambient air cools itself before entering the house through the grating which serves as flooring, so cunningly hidden by twine matting that probably half the members of the house are not aware of its existence.

The blocks of ice are for summer time. In wintry weather the air is comfortably heated before it enters the chamber. When the fog lies low over London the outer air passes through layers of cotton wool 6 inches thick. The appearance of the cotton wool after a few hours' fog is a painful object lesson for citizens. There was a memorable occasion when the fog prevailed unintermittedly for forty-eight hours, with the result that the cotton wool was as black as the back of a chimney. I have groped my way down to the house through a dense fog, and entering the legislative chamber, have found it absolutely free from mist, the atmosphere in normal condition. That is the ultimate triumph of the patient, cultured care that watches over the lungs of the House of Commons.

By this elaborate process does fresh air get into the legislative chamber in unbroken supply. How the vitiated atmosphere, occasionally tainted with strong language, escapes is a simpler process. By the marge of the ceiling are panels opening upon a space left between it and the roof. The air, rarified by use, ascends as the sparks fly upward, escapes by these open panels, is conducted by flues to the basement, and delivered in a gallery ending in a shaft opening up in the clock tower, a height of 230 feet. On the basement a great fire brightly burns on open hearth. Drawing to it the inrushing air, it drives it up the shaft and so into the infinitude of spacious London.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] in a moment or two will be prepared to occupy some time. As soon as he returns to the Chamber I will yield to him. In the meantime, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the bill which the committee has presented appropriates in round numbers some $11,000,000. The bill is based upon the usual estimates submitted through the usual channel—the Treasury Department—and all items estimated for are contained in the bill, save the item providing for the education of children not alone of Indian blood, but those of white blood, in the new State of Oklahoma, or that part of the State which was formerly the Indian Territory. That estimate was for an appropriation of $300,000.

Upon the hearing it appeared that the appropriation for last year—that is, the fiscal year in which we are now—was not fully exhausted, nor was the appropriation for the preceding fiscal year; and it seemed quite apparent that a lesser amount than that which was asked for in the estimates would meet every requirement of the present year, so that in this particular the bill contains an item for an appropriation of but $150,000. There are some legislative items in the bill which have all met the approval of the bureau and of the department, not all through the usual channel of an estimate, but by supplemental estimates, which have come either directly to the committee or to the Speaker, and were referred to the committee. So that all the estimates in the bill have the approval of the department having in charge the Indian service. There are some items of legislation in the bill, not many, but some which are undoubtedly obnoxious to the rule, providing anybody chose to invoke the rule.

The committee have incorporated in the bill only such items as they believed were for the betterment of the Indian service. There is nothing in the affairs of the Indians especially new. Last year the House in its wisdom saw fit to provide that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs should examine into the question of disposing of certain of the nonreservation schools and seeing if they could be transferred to any of the States to be continued as educational institutions, at which Indian pupils might be educated without paying tuition. The commissioner reported with reference to five or six schools—I have forgotten which—that it would be well to dispose of them; and, in reference to two of them, stated that a tentative agreement had been made with the State to take over the institutions. In reference to all of these schools upon which the commissioner reports, we provide for the disposal of them to the State upon terms which are accepted by the Secretary of the Interior, but we provide that in case they are not disposed of the appropriation for the coming fiscal year shall be continued as in the last fiscal year.

In other words, so that if the school is not disposed of it will not be an empty and abandoned plant, to be kicked to pieces by vandals, but will be a going institution until such time as it is disposed of.

Mr. SCOTT. Can the gentleman from New York advise the committee at this time as to the names of the schools which have been recommended to be discontinued?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; but none of them are in Kansas. I will say to the gentleman that, in my judgment, the Haskell School, in Kansas, in which I expect he is especially interested, will not be done away with for some little time. I should say that the Haskell School; the school at Riverside, Cal.; the Phoenix School, perhaps; the school at Chilocco, in Oklahoma, perhaps; the Salem School, in Oregon; and two or three of the schools in the Northwest, it will be necessary to continue for many years yet; but it is the belief of the commissioner that quite a few of the nonreservation schools can properly and with profit be dispensed with now. The House made provision in the last appropriation bill for that to be done at the earliest practicable moment.

The number of Indian pupils enrolled during the last fiscal year was slightly in excess of those enrolled during the preceding year, the number in actual attendance slightly in excess—a very small matter of two or three hundred, or something of that kind. As is known, the Indian population increases very slowly, but it has increased some. The matter of allotment to Indians is increasing with reasonable rapidity. More and more Indians every year are receiving their allotments, building houses, adopting civilized dress, devoting their energies to agriculture, and reaching a higher degree of civilization. In other words, the general progress of the Indian race toward eventual civilization is reasonably satisfactory.

In the matter of irrigation, much has been done during the last year, and provision is made in the bill now presented for a generous appropriation for the continuance of that work. Not only do we provide for appropriations in the way of gratuities for the continuance of this work, but we also provide that certain of the Indian funds be used for putting in irrigation systems, which shall enchance the value of the lands and improve the opportunities for production from those lands.

I think, in a general way, I have covered the main provisions in the bill. From time to time, as we take up the bill under the five-minute rule, I imagine gentlemen may be interested in obtaining more specific information in reference to individual items, and I believe that some member of the committee will be able to give the Committee of the Whole all the information that it desires upon any subject.

There is nothing of a partisan nature in the Indian appropriation bill. There has been nothing of partisanship in the preparation of the bill, and I trust that the action of the committee in the main will meet the approval of the Committee of the Whole, and that the efforts of the committee and the efforts of the department to progress toward the goal which we all have long desired and still desire to attain, in order to place the Indians in a position where they will become civilized, and where they will become self-supporting, will be rewarded at an early day.

I was a bit surprised at the remarks which were made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY]. That he had a bill before the Indian Committee, in which he was intensely interested, had not before been made known to the members of that committee. Ordinarily when a gentleman introduces a bill he calls the attention of some member of the committee to the fact that he has such a bill and ordinarily requests reference of it to a subcommittee. That has not been done in reference to this bill, else it would have been referred to a subcommittee which would have given attention to it and given a hearing on the subject if he desired it.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LANGLEY. I desire to state to the gentleman from New York that I believe I have discussed this bill with nearly every member of the committee time and again and, so far as I have been advised, there has not been a hearing this session on a proposition of that kind. I may be mistaken about it, but if I am the gentleman can correct me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to concede that the gentleman has discussed it with every member of the committee save the chairman of the committee. He had not discussed it with the chairman, and I did not know that he wanted a hearing or he should have had one. I think the gentleman, if he had given careful consideration to the subject himself, would hardly have made a statement in a form quite so severely critical of the department and of the committee of this House which has charge of Indian matters.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. I did not intend to indulge in any criticism of the committee, and I do not think the stenographer's notes will show that I did; but I did intend to criticise the administration of this Indian estate; and I also desire to say that the bill to which I referred a while ago was introduced quite recently, and perhaps, in justice to the committee, I ought to say that doubtless it has scarcely had time yet, in view of its other duties, to give hearings on this particular bill. The gentleman is correct in the statement that I have not yet talked with him about this bill, but I did talk with him on the general subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad to have the gentleman make that statement, which modifies the statement made a few moments ago.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not like to be put in a wrong attitude. I said this last bill of mine was introduced quite recently. I was not complaining about the failure to give hearings on that. I merely said I hoped the committee would do so promptly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not intend to put the gentleman in a wrong attitude. I yield to him with great pleasure.

Mr. LANGLEY. I was endeavoring to make an explanatory statement which, I think, harmonizes with what I said before. I think the gentleman from New York—unintentionally, of course—makes it appear that I am now retracting what I said.

I repeat that the administration of this Indian estate is little less than a national scandal, and that it is an injustice to these Indian claimants to be deprived, by legislation or by failure to legislate, of their just rights. I am sure the gentleman from New York would not desire to deprive any legal claimant of an opportunity to participate in the distribution of this estate. I am sure if he knew the people in my district who are descendants of these Indians, he would not oppose legislation that would enable them to go into the United States courts to have their rights determined.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do wish to say that in my judgment the administration of the affairs of the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes since the United States Government has attempted to bring order out of chaos, to bring decency out of disorder, to bring law instead of lawlessness and crime, has been anything but a national scandal; and I do say that there are no Indians down there who have been deprived of their day in court. If, Mr. Chairman, they have neglected to take advantage of the law which has been given to everybody down there to have a day in court, the administration ought not to be criticised in such sweeping terms because Congress does not now see fit to open up the rolls and give to men an opportunity to litigate over alleged rights when heretofore an opportunity has been given to go into the courts.

I did not intend to take any time this afternoon to discuss the merits or demerits, if it have any, of the Indian appropriation bill, but only to occupy a little time until the gentleman from Vermont should be present, and I have occupied so much time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman, for my information, if it is the policy of the law to permit these Indians to go into court and set up their rights in some court that we have established?

Mr. SHERMAN. The policy has been to let them go in; but the rolls have been completed and have been closed, and the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, as I understand it, now is—after the allotment has been largely completed, fully in some of the tribes, and after the work of enrollment is well toward completion in others—to open the whole proposition and let individuals now go into the court by the hundreds or thousands and litigate that matter and in that way try to extend the time within which we desire to close up these matters.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman for that statement. But here is what I have in mind: The Indian has always been a ward of the Government, and he has been a ward because a savage, and a savage because he could not help himself. Now, I just want to know whether these ex-savages or savages were required to go into the courts and set up their rights, or they would be estopped or pro confesso would be taken against them, as it would be taken against the gentleman from New York or myself.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certain rolls were accepted as established rolls made up by the Indian tribes. Provision was made for additions. Subsequently a time limit was fixed within which that question should be closed up, and that time limit has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I can very well understand the Indians would not know what a pro confesso meant, and what I want to know is whether there ought not to be somebody down there to take charge of the Indian to see that his rights are not lopped off by some limitation of law.

Mr. LANGLEY. There are many Indian descendants in my district, remote from railroad and other methods of communication, who did not know anything about any limitation on their right to make application and who therefore are not, in equity, properly chargeable with laches.

Mr. SHERMAN. There has been somebody there whose business it was to see that the rights were not lopped off, and whose desire it was, and whose attempt it was, to see that those rights were protected; but the gentleman will understand that where there are 100,000 people scattered over tens of thousands of square miles of territory, where the complete census had not been made by the United States, some of them possibly would not be reached by the authorities.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is what I wanted to know, whether this ex-savage, I will say for short, is to be cut off from what he otherwise would have had by the closing of these rolls.

Mr. SHERMAN. If he was on the accepted roll of his own people he would be provided for. I will admit that there are some cases where injustice is done by not opening the rolls, but in the large number of cases there is no apparent merit in the application of the people who desire to be enrolled.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman can see what I have in mind.

Mr. SHERMAN. I see what the gentleman from Tennessee has in mind.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As a practitioner in the gentleman's own court and State, sometimes he will find a defenseless woman who says she is about to be turned out of her home, and upon looking at the case in court he finds that the bill against her has been taken pro confesso, and that hardships of that kind result through ignorance of the persons' own rights.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, probably individual cases will be brought to light down there of hardship, but the question is whether it is better to hold up this whole work of progress, the work of civilization, or to let the hardship fall upon a few individuals.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a moment, so that I may set myself right in the RECORD?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, I am willing to yield to the gentleman to set himself right if he is in the wrong. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. That is not exactly a correct statement of my purpose. I do not accept the gentleman's interpretation of my purpose in interrupting him. I am not admitting that I am wrong, but contend that the gentleman is wrong in his understanding of what I said and meant.

The gentleman from New York seems to be under the impression that I sought to criticise and particularize the present administration of Indian affairs. I did not do that. I referred to the administration of this Indian estate, which, as the gentleman knows, covers more than three-quarters of a century. I did not intend, as the gentleman from New York seems to think, to criticise in particular the present administration. Now, Mr. Chairman, I should say more upon one or two points to which the gentleman has referred but for the fact that I know my friend and colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] is shortly to address the House on the same subject and that he has prepared the material which will sustain every statement I have made, and I do not wish to trespass upon the ground that I know he is going to cover.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I understood the gentleman's remarks, they were addressed more particularly to the situation that has arisen since the passage by Congress of the act which was intended to terminate the existence of the so-called "national government" of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I referred to that, but I also referred to the whole history of this estate, and that, broadly speaking, was what I had in mind.

Mr. SHERMAN. My remarks had entirely to do with the administration under the acts which began with the act known as the "Dawes Act," and the appointment of the Dawes Commission.

Mr. LANGLEY. I was referring to this and several other things. Let me ask the gentleman from New York this question: He said a while ago that I had not asked for a hearing before the full committee. If I ask for that hearing will I get it? I am referring now, not to the bill I introduced last session, but to the bill I introduced the other day.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman will get a hearing before the committee, if he asks for it now, provided the hearings already asked for and promised on other matters will not occupy all of the time which the committee will have during this session.

Mr. LANGLEY. Hearings on other matters?

Mr. SHERMAN. Hearings on other matters which have already been asked for.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from New York for that assurance. I want him and his associates on the committee to understand that, while I know they will not report a bill on this subject at the present session, I do not question that they will give proper consideration to all measures presented to the committee. I merely desired to express my anxiety for action at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, It is sometimes extremely difficult to secure consideration in the House of Representatives for a piece of proposed legislation that seems to commend itself to the great majority of those who have given it consideration. We appropriated the other day nearly $235,000,000 for the expense of the Post-Office Department for the next fiscal year. We did it readily. It took but a short time. On the other hand, I have been endeavoring for a long time to secure the necessary legislation changing the postage rates on parcels between every post-office and the patrons on any routes eminating therefrom. The propriety of this legislation can not, it seems to me, be questioned by any fair-minded man who gives the subject thoughtful consideration. To-day one in San Francisco can send through the mail a package weighing 4 pounds to any patron on the rural routes emanating from my post-office in Burlington for 64 cents. But if I desire to send the same package weighing 4 pounds to the same patron on the same route emanating from the same post-office in Burlington, where the package will be carried 3 miles instead of 3,000 miles, I have to pay the same 64 cents. I can send the same package to London for 48 cents.

Of course it is needless to say that this condition is ridiculous. But it is more than that. It is unjust and unreasonable, and we should not let the Sixtieth Congress end without having taken action. A reasonable rate of postage on parcels on routes emanating from the same office is asked for with practical unanimity by the patrons on our rural routes. From the standpoint of the Government we ought to take prompt action, for such a rate must inevitably greatly increase the income from these routes, which now are a burden upon the Post-Office Department. The Government and the patrons on these routes are the ones who would be affected by this proposed legislation, and as both would be benefited by the change it is difficult to understand why Congress did not act long ago in the premises.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman is doubtless aware that the objection most commonly urged against the proposition contained in his bill is that if it should be adopted it would only be the beginning of a country-wide parcels post, and I should be glad if he would address himself to that phase of the subject.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I will state to the gentleman that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] came very near asking the question I intended to ask, but I want to know if it could be explained why the local merchants whom it seems would profit by the rural-route delivery are constantly sending petitions against the local rural-route delivery?

It is undoubtedly true that a strong effort has been made in certain quarters to create opposition to this proposed legislation on the theory that it would lead inevitably to a country-wide parcels post. A studied effort has been made by certain interests which are opposed to a general parcels post to prejudice the country merchant against any change in the postage rates on parcels on our rural routes. These interests have warned the country merchant that any such change would be but an opening wedge which the advocates of a general parcels post would promptly drive home to the utter ruin of all country merchants. They have frantically appealed to these country merchants to bestir themselves, to organize, to present a solid front of opposition to the insidious foe, to petition their Congressman, and assure him in the most emphatic way that for reasons purely personal and selfish they would bitterly oppose any change in existing rates of postage whereby a parcel could be conveyed from a post-office to a patron on a rural route emanating therefrom at a just and reasonable rate.

I hold in my hand some reprints from the Iron Age, which illustrate very clearly the methods employed to create prejudice against this proposed legislation and to give the impression that the country merchants were a unit in opposition to it. These reprints were sent to me some weeks ago. I understand that they were sent quite generally to Members of the House, and as they tell the whole story of the efforts of outsiders to deprive the farmers of the country of this much-needed legislation, I shall ask the Clerk to read them in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, they will be read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPRINTS FROM THE IRON AGE.

The indications are becoming more and more clear that the form of merchandise post which will be urged upon Congress at the next session will be that on the rural routes, limiting the service, as well as may be, to packages mailed on such routes, or at the post-office from which they start. The less energetic pressure for the time being for a general parcels post measure may be regarded as a recognition of the force of the objections which hold against it, in view of which there seems to be little probability that the scheme will have sufficient supporters in Congress to encourage the expectation that it can be enacted into law at the coming short session. Very earnest efforts, however, will doubtless be made to secure the passage of a law establishing a merchandise service on the rural routes under the specious plea that this form of parcels post will be to the interest of the retail merchants throughout the country, because giving to them facilities for the carriage of merchandise on the rural routes emanating from their towns, while such facilities are denied to merchandise in the mails at large. It is therefore argued that such a form of parcels post would be advantageous to the smaller communities.

The opponents of the scheme should lose no time and spare no effort in combating this insidious attempt to establish a parcels post, even on a limited scale. The objections to the proposal should be emphasized and enforced:

That it is contrary to public policy for the Government to go into the business of transporting merchandise.

That a large expenditure would be required to furnish the rural carriers with the necessary outfit and conveniences for the carrying of merchandise on their routes.

That it would be impracticable to limit the service as proposed to merchandise originating at the offices from which the rural routes start.

That it is not unlikely that the proposed law would be pronounced unconstitutional as class legislation.

That there is great danger that there would be a gradual enlargement of the service so that a parcels post on the rural routes would be an entering wedge, and prepare the way for a general-merchandise post.

That the carriage of merchandise in the mails would tend to build up the trade of the catalogue houses, and to extend mail-order business with the large cities to the injury of merchants generally throughout the country.

That the present arrangement by which carriers deliver packages without charge, or at a nominal charge, is more advantageous to the retail merchants than would be the proposed change in the law which would require a regular postal charge in all cases.

That the proposed service is not desired by the retail merchants of the country, who regard it as dangerous and diminishing instead of increasing their present facilities.

The important matter at this juncture is to have brought to the attention of the Post-Office Department and to Congress, as well as to the public at large, the fact that the retail merchants throughout the country do not desire the rural parcels post, and do not regard it as in their interest, but, with large, substantial unanimity, are opposed to it. If the retail associations in hardware and other lines desire to be useful in a practical way in combating the parcels post, they can do no more effective work than find means to bring out, and to bring out without delay, an emphatic expression of the opinion of local retail merchants on this point. If the retailers generally desire a rural parcels post they are likely to have an opportunity to enjoy it. If, on the other hand, they do not want it, there should be no loss of time in making it plain. Resolutions in convention are not sufficient. There should be protests from merchants in every town and village. In this work the hardware associations may take a leading part. If they do not do this, it will be to miss a great opportunity. But what they do should be done immediately.

ADOPTION OF RURAL PARCELS POST WOULD STIMULATE DEMAND FOR FURTHER LEGISLATION.

The readers of the Iron Age who have followed the developments of the past few years, especially in connection with the expansion of the rural free-delivery service, do not need to be told that the adoption of a rural parcels post, so far from putting an end to legislation, would merely stimulate a demand from all parts of the country for a general parcels post. In fact, it is difficult to see how Congress could refuse such an extension, especially if the postal officials could make a respectable showing regarding the alleged success of the institution as applied to rural routes. As to the effect of the proposed experiment on rural routes, the Post-Office Department is so fully committed to the project and would so completely control all official reports on the subject, that it goes without saying that the experiment would merely serve to redouble the present demand.

FORM OF PETITION TO CONGRESSMEN.

Some one in each town should move actively and at once to obtain from merchants in the various lines of business their signatures to a protest against the parcels post in any form, and particularly against the special parcels post on the rural routes.

Unless some one else is taking this matter up, each hardware man should consider it obligatory on him to do so, conferring with his fellow-merchants, perhaps calling a meeting of the merchants of the town, or directly circulating the petition, as may seem best under the particular circumstances of each case.

The following form of petition is suggested to be used in obtaining the signatures of merchants in the various branches of trade, the petition being sent to the Representative in Congress:

[Town, State], December —, 1908.

To ——— ——— [your Representative in Congress]:

We, the undersigned, in business in ——— [town, State], enter our earnest and emphatic protest against the establishment of a parcels post on the rural routes and against parcels-post legislation in any form.

We regard the carriage of merchandise in the mails on the rural routes as not only open to many serious objections on the ground of expense and public policy, but desire to emphasize the fact that while it would be greatly to the advantage of the catalogue houses and the department stores of the large cities, it would be detrimental to our interests and to the business welfare of the smaller communities.

Name.	Business.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. So far as my State and district are concerned these efforts to mislead the country merchants have had very little effect, for our merchants do their own thinking. They can see that the rural-delivery service has come to stay, and that this proposed legislation is necessary to perfect the system. They can see that common everyday justice requires that this proposed reduction in postage should be made. They can see that it will bring them into closer relationship with all the patrons on routes emanating from their respective post-offices. They can see that from the standpoint of the Post-Office Department the change is desirable, as it will bring the routes to a higher degree of efficiency and will enable them to become more nearly self-supporting. They see that there is no more connection between this low rate of postage for this local purpose and a general parcels post than there is between 1-cent postage on local letters and the general 2-cent letter postage. In short, they see that the proposed legislation is in their own interest, in the interest of the farmers, and in the interest of the General Government, and that it can injure no one.

As showing the sentiment in my State upon the subject, I desire to have read in my time two editorials selected from many that have recently appeared in the press of Vermont.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless objection is heard, they will be read in the gentleman's time.

[Editorial from the Northfield (Vt.) News.]

A PRACTICAL PROPOSITION.

A bill recently introduced in Congress by Representative FOSTER, of Vermont, reads as follows:

"A bill providing special postage rate on third-class and fourth-class matter on rural free-delivery routes.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the rate of postage on third-class and fourth-class matter on all the rural free-delivery routes emanating from the same office shall be as follows: On packages weighing 8 ounces or less, 1 cent; on packages weighing more than 8 ounces and not more than 1 pound, 2 cents; on packages weighing over 1 pound, 2 cents for each pound or fraction thereof: Provided, That no package weighing over 10 pounds shall be received for conveyance under the provisions of this act."

If the News is not mistaken, this is a measure which will appeal to all people living on rural-delivery routes and in cities and towns from which such routes originate. The purpose is to give a reasonable postage rate for packages going over rural routes, and the enactment of the measure can hardly fail to be of great value to farmers and other residents living along such routes, as well as to local business men and citizens generally.

Under this proposed rate merchants will be able to serve patrons on rural routes with dispatch. A farmer may wish something for immediate use. He will telephone to the merchant, or to a number of merchants, for prices, place his order, and in a few hours the package is delivered at a minimum price for transportation. In many ways this proposed service can be used to great advantage.

The Government would also derive a handsome revenue from such a plan, as the service can be rendered without additional expense, and this means ultimately a further improved rural-delivery system. It is certainly reasonable to hope that Congress will act promptly and favorably upon Mr. FOSTER's measure.

[Editorial from the St. Albans (Vt.) Messenger.]

THE PARCELS POST.

When men like Elihu Root, now New York's Senator-elect, commit themselves in vigorous language to the parcels-post proposition, there may be some hope that eventually Congress will wake up to heed the public interest in this matter. In his speech before the legislature at Albany Mr. Root said:

"If you think it will be beneficial to the State of New York, for example, as I now think it would be, to have a parcels-post provision included in our postal laws, so that the 39,000 rural free-delivery wagons, instead of driving around the country with empty buggies, as they do now, shall earn enough to pay their salary by carrying small packages to the people they serve—if you think that would be beneficial to the interests of the State of New York, I would be glad to have you say so. And if you think I am wrong in that I would be glad to have you say that."

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. In this connection I desire to have read a few of the many letters I have received from my constituents on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless objection is heard, the Clerk will read the letters in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

ST. ALBANS, VT., January 18, 1909.

MY DEAR MR. FOSTER: In a recent issue of the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press I note the text of a bill introduced into the House by yourself providing for a material reduction on mail matter of the third and fourth classes on the rural free delivery routes emanating from the same office.

I believe the passage of this bill and the adoption of such a policy by the Post-Office Department would not only be of material advantage to the patrons of the rural free delivery routes, thereby enabling them to purchase their supplies more readily, but it would also very largely increase the revenue of the several routes.

Very respectfully, yours,

GEO. T. CHILDS.

Hon. D. J. FOSTER, M. C.
Washington, D. C.

BRISTOL, VT., January 23, 1909.

Hon. D. J. FOSTER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: At this time I desire to bring to your attention the urgent need of a local rate for the transmission of parcels of merchandise on rural free delivery routes; a rate which will not be prohibitive, and that will tend to do away with abuses of the carrying privilege of parcels, as it is now accorded to rural carriers.

As such legislation has already been recommended by the Postmaster-General, and as there is apparent likelihood of something being done in the matter, I wish to express to you my views on the subject as they appear after eight years' experience with the rural service.

Our village, as you know, is a central point of trade for the greater portion of four towns adjoining; into which towns, the four rural routes emanating from this office extend. A good part of this territory is now covered by telephone service, and doubtless within a few years nearly, if not quite all, will be.

This extends to the farmer remote from town the opportunity to save much time and travel by telephoning his order to the local merchant, and have small articles of merchandise brought to his door by rural carrier, providing a rate for the transportation of such may be fixed which will not be prohibitive, as is now the case at the present rate, 1 cent per ounce.

At present there is but little merchandise carried for hire by the carriers at this office. Before the ruling now in force went into effect—the 4-pound limit—there was a large quantity carried. Small parcels weighing from 1 to 7 or 8 ounces are often mailed; larger ones very seldom.

There is one point which I wish also to bring to your attention in connection, which I think ought to be considered. It is this: The acacceptance of liquids for mailing on rural routes in a more simple form than is prescribed for regular mails. The greater part of the carrying of parcels by our rural carriers at present is medicines from druggists and doctors; and I have no doubt this holds true generally throughout the country. If a simple form of wrapping same in a strong pasteboard or wooden box was permissible, it would, I believe, add an amount of revenue worthy of consideration.

Knowing, as I do, that you have always the betterment of the rural service in mind, I am confident that you will work for this much-needed reform, which, as I truly believe, will increase the revenue of rural routes two or three fold, and at the same time extend to the patron the privilege of having the rate on merchandise paid to his door by the sender.

I am confident that if such a law may be enacted it will in a great measure help to wipe out the deficit that is now chargeable to the rural service; at the same time help the country merchant and please the patrons of rural delivery generally.

I am, very sincerely, yours, F. G. HASKINS.

MIDDLEBURY, VT., January 16, 1909.

Hon. D. J. FOSTER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I notice in yesterday's Free Press that you have introduced a bill to reduce the postage on parcels on our rural routes. I sincerely hope that this bill will pass, as I know it will be of great help to the farmers and to the village merchants. Everyone appreciates the rural free-delivery service, but we realize that we and the Government are receiving only half the benefit that we should enjoy if a parcels post were introduced on these routes.

Thanking you for your efforts in this direction and assuring you the full support of your constituents in this vicinity, I am,

Very truly, yours,

A. W. FOOTE.

BENNINGTON, VT., January 21, 1909.

Hon. DAVID J. FOSTER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have looked into the provisions of your bill relative to a change in the postage rates on parcels on our rural routes, and I give the proposed measure my hearty approval. I believe that it would open up a new channel for the circulation of books and magazines between the farmers, which certainly would furnish them a source of pleasure and profit. I have had inquiries from several merchants lately requesting that such a bill as you have introduced become a law. They believe it would be a great advantage to them, owing to the extent that telephones are now used in this vicinity. I believe that this bill, if it should pass, would bring additional revenue to the post-office and be a source of great convenience to all its patrons.

Very sincerely, yours, COLLINS M. GRAVES.

VERGENNES, VT., January 20, 1909.

Hon. D. J. FOSTER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to bill H. R. 26207, providing special postage rate on third-class and fourth-class matter on rural free-delivery routes.

A careful inquiry among the tradespeople here convinces me that such a law would be popular and to the advantage of the merchant in the small village and to the people served by the rural delivery.

Respectfully, yours,

THOMAS MACK.

MORRISVILLE, VT., December 31, 1908.

Hon. D. J. FOSTER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wonder if you would be willing to do something more to help the patrons of our rural routes by securing lower rates of postage on third and fourth class matter on all routes emanating from the same post-office? Such a change would increase the revenue from these routes and at the same time prove a great convenience to the patrons.

Only last week we had a rather important package of third-class Sunday-school matter offered one of our routes by one of the state Sunday-school officials. We could not accept the package. Even if we could have taken it, he could not have afforded to send it through the mail at the present rates.

Our merchants have many packages of merchandise which would be forwarded through the mail over these routes if we only had a reasonable rate of postage. It would assist both the village merchant and the farmer if we could secure the necessary legislation.

Hoping that this will meet with your approval, I remain,

Very sincerely, yours,

H. J. FISHER.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. In addition to many letters like these, I have received many numerously signed petitions from the patrons on the rural routes in my district all urging the reduced postage on parcels. Everyone understands how awkward the situation now is. If a farmer on one of these routes telephones the local merchant for something weighing 3 pounds, the merchant can not send the package through the mail to his customer, for it would cost 48 cents to do so. But as the package is mailable the letter carrier can not be asked to carry out the package. So what is done? Why, the merchant throws in enough refuse matter to make the package weigh over 4 pounds. Then it is not mailable, and then the farmer can pay the carrier 5 or 10 cents for bringing it out to him.

Mr. SMITH of California. Do I understand that you would favor a general parcels-post system?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. In the short time that is given me, I can not undertake to discuss the larger and broader proposition of a general parcels-post system. What I am trying to demonstrate is that there is absolutely no connection between the provisions of my bill and the proposition of a general parcels post, and that common justice and common sense and common business principles require that a reasonable rate be provided for carrying these small parcels short distances on our rural routes.

The gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] made it plain in a speech which he delivered some months ago that he is not in favor of a general parcels-post system. I am willing to concede that the proposition of a general parcels post involves a question of public policy as to which men honestly differ. Everyone who has given the subject serious consideration understands that it is a problem by no means easy to work out. We know that it would mean the addition of a regiment to the army which now comprises the employees of the Post-Office Department. It would mean the employment of men with teams in every town where city delivery is in vogue to gather up and distribute these parcels. And any parcels post to meet with approval must necessarily be self-supporting. That is to say, the rate of postage should be such as to fully compensate the department for the expense of administering the system. The popular idea of a parcels system is the one in vogue in England, for instance, where, owing to the short distances, it is possible to fix a flat rate of postage. It would be extremely difficult, in my judgment, to establish a parcels-post system in this country, with our immense distances, with a flat rate of postage. It has always seemed to me that the only method by which a satisfactory system could be worked out in this country would be by adjusting the rate to the weight of the parcel and the distance it is to be carried. Sixty-four cents, for instance, is a very reasonable charge for carrying 4 pounds from Boston to San Francisco.

But it is an exorbitant charge for carrying the same package 100 miles. And so to-day if one has a 4-pound package he desires to send a short distance he sends it by express, and the express company gets the profit. If he desires to send it a long distance he sends it by mail, and the Post-Office Department carries it at a loss. So, if a parcels post is ever established in this country, it must be along the lines which will make it self-supporting and at the same time popular, by making the cost of carriage dependent upon the weight of the package and the distance it is to be carried. But, as I said before, there is no connection whatever between that proposition and the one to which I call the attention of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of California. Then let me ask another question: How are you going to keep down the demand of the people for some uniformity in the postal service?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I shall never undertake to keep down any demand of the people that is just and reasonable.

Mr. SMITH of California. You are combating the idea that your proposition is the opening wedge.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes; I am combating that idea, and I think I have shown conclusively that that idea is an utterly erroneous one.

Mr. SMITH of California. I am very positive the moment you begin to serve one neighbor by the carriage of his merchandise by mail and refuse it to another neighbor you will never have a moment's rest until a general system is established.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] must keep in mind two things. First, there is no express company ready to carry these packages over these rural routes. If the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] desires to send a 4-pound package 100 miles he can send it through the mail or he can send it by express. But the farmer who desires to have a 4-pound package sent to him by mail from his local post-office can not afford to pay 64 cents for the privilege. So to-day no facilities are afforded him for the conveyance of parcels.

In the second place, the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] must never forget why it is that the people of the country are crying out for a general parcels post. He knows very well that it is because the express companies have become a grinding monopoly and that the people of the land are seeking relief therefrom through the instrumentality of a government parcels post. And the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] should not lose sight of the fact that the proposed local rate of postage on parcels is not entirely novel. I again call attention to the fact that the rate of postage on local letters, except where free city delivery is in vogue, is 1 cent. If the people in the larger cities, seeing their neighbors in the smaller places paying only 1 cent for local letters, have cried out for the same privilege for their local letters they have done so in vain. The fact is that 1 cent for such local letters in those small communities is amply sufficient, and it would be an injustice to fix a higher rate of postage. We are asking simply for a just and reasonable local rate on parcels on these rural routes.

And let me remind the gentleman from California of a further fact. If there is one institution of the Republic that more than another can be said to belong to the people as a whole, it is the Post-Office Department. It was organized and is maintained for their use and benefit. To increase its usefulness and efficiency in every possible way should be the high purpose of the representatives of the people in the Congress. Every cent of the vast income of the Post-Office Department, amounting now to nearly $250,000,000 per year, comes directly from those who patronize it. This is literally true. For the amount which comes from the National Treasury is in lieu of postage for the great amount of matter that is sent out by the different departments of the Government under their respective franks. This great department of the Government will continue to be administered in the interest of its patrons, and whenever the majority of those patrons decide that they want a general parcels post, such a system will be established.

Mr. SMITH of California. Does the gentleman think that we can add a very large amount to the burden which the rural carrier will have to provide for without providing additional compensation for him?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I have no idea that the farmers on these routes are going to sit up nights devising how they can have packages sent them, provided the proposed legislation is had. It does not seem at all probable that there would be any such amount of business done on any route as to burden the carrier. The question as to the carriers' compensation should always be, Is it reasonable? In my judgment these carriers are now more poorly paid than any other class of employees in the Government.

In all probability from time to time their pay will be increased. If we should enable them to earn more for the Government it is doubtless true that they would from time to time urge that fact as an argument for an increase in their salaries. As I said a few moments ago, we shall soon have 50,000 of these rural routes, and I estimate that on an average at the start a carrier would earn under my bill 30 cents a day. This would mean a million and a half dollars increase per year and every cent of this would be net profit. It is just so much to be added to the credit of these rural routes that to-day are costing us so much.

Mr. SMITH of California. The gentleman will certainly admit that during the seasons of the year when the farmer is busiest and the roads are the worst is when they will use the carrier most.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes; that is undoubtedly true, and it may be that the gentleman is entirely right in believing that under the provisions of my bill these routes would be patronized the year round much more than I have supposed they would be. But everyone who is at all familiar with the subject knows perfectly well that the carrier on any of these routes could take with him every morning 50 additional pounds of mail without the slightest inconvenience. This would mean that he would earn for the Post-Office Department at least a dollar a day additional instead of the 30 cents at which I estimate the amount he would earn.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Vermont a question. Would he impose this additional burden upon the rural carrier without giving him additional compensation?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I would say that without this additional burden the question of the compensation of the carriers on these rural routes is one for Congress to deal with. I believe that they should be given just and reasonable compensation. If, however, they were earning more for the National Treasury, if their routes were more nearly self-supporting, this fact would naturally be an argument in favor of increased compensation.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman not think that additional compensation should go along with the proposition?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly, if the business of these routes should increase as rapidly as my friend from California [Mr. SMITH] fears it would, it is probable that the carrier would be entitled to additional compensation. But as I said before, these carriers are at all times entitled to reasonable compensation. Their task is an exacting one; and they are placed under very strict rules.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of California. Does not the country merchant universally prefer to have the customer come into the store to do his trading?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Well, that was formerly the general wish of the country merchant. In fact, at the start many of them were opposed to the establishment and extension of the rural-delivery system, because they feared that if the farmers did not come to town daily they would patronize the stores less.

Mr. SMITH of California. Then this proposed system would not benefit him.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I contend that it would benefit him, and this is the belief of many of these merchants in my district. This rural-delivery system has come to stay, and it is now in the interest of the country merchant to facilitate by every possible means his connections with the patrons of these routes. The up-to-date country merchant has come to learn that country life has been revolutionized by rural delivery and the telephone and the creamery. I am the last man to undertake anything which would tend to injure one of these country merchants, but up to this time no one has been able to point out wherein this proposed legislation would work any injury to anyone. With the provisions of my bill in force the farmers, as a rule, would continue to go to town when they desire to make purchases. On the other hand, however, many times when it would not be convenient for them to go to town they would telephone to their merchant for needed articles. Thus purchases would be promptly made which under existing conditions are many times postponed, perhaps indefinitely.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. How far does the gentleman's bill propose to go in the matter of weight and size? I did not hear the first of it.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The rate of postage fixed in my bill is as follows: On packages weighing less than half a pound, 1 cent; on packages weighing over half a pound and not over 1 pound, 2 cents; on packages weighing over 1 pound, 2 cents for each pound or fraction thereof. If we were perfecting the bill to-day, I think I should suggest a uniform rate of 1 cent for each half pound or fraction thereof. The limit of weight per package is 10 pounds.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Ten pounds is the limit?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Ten pounds is the limit.

Now, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. What I wanted to call to the attention of the gentlemen was this. It can be said in favor of the rural parcels post that if the rate of postage was 20 cents for carrying 10 pounds the entire 20 cents would go into the National Treasury; while if the same rate of 20 cents for 10 pounds was the rule in connection with a general parcels post the amount of postage would not compensate the Government for what it would have to pay the railroad for carrying the package.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I want to say to the gentleman that I have had a number of letters and petitions, but that so far as the people whom I represent are concerned, they do not so much oppose the rural parcels post as they do the general parcels post. They have sent me some of these petitions which contain opposition to any parcels-post legislation to which the gentleman has called our attention. In answering I have stated that while I should not vote for a general parcels post, I was in favor of the proposition contained in the gentleman's bill. I am glad to say that in reply to my letters they have not offered any opposition to the proposed rural parcels post. This is what I desired to say to the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I am confident that if the Members of the House would take the matter up with their constituents, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] has done with his constituents, it would be found that there is very little local opposition to this proposed legislation.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman's bill, if made a law, destroy the country merchants and build up the great cities?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I have attempted, and I think succeeded in showing that it will prove advantageous to the country merchants, and it certainly has nothing whatever to do with the great cities. It simply provides a local postal rate for packages carried a short distance on these rural routes. The provision is analogous to the law which provides penny postage for local letters where city delivery is not in vogue.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can not a package be sent from Cincinnati—say, out to my home, where I was born and reared—and destroy the small merchant who used to sell it to me?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. At present, packages which do not weigh over 4 pounds can be sent from San Francisco to patrons along any of the rural routes of the district so ably represented by my friend from Tennessee. My bill proposes a reasonable rate for carrying similar packages from any post-office to the patrons on the routes emanating from that office.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Would not this have a tendency to wipe out the small merchants?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. On the contrary, all my experience, and nearly all my information from home and from communities like the community of my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] who has just spoken, indicate that it will bring the farmers on the routes into closer contact with the village grocer, the village druggist, and the village doctor, and that they will all profit by it and that no one will be damaged by it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the gentleman estimated how much revenue would be collected by carrying packages in this way?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I said a moment ago that the time is at hand when we shall have 50,000 of these carriers. I think a very modest estimate is that 30 cents per day would be earned, on an average, by these carriers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who gets that?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think that a part of that ought to go to the carrier?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I have stated repeatedly in the course of this discussion that these carriers should receive reasonable compensation, and that it is for Congress to say from time to time whether under all the circumstances they are entitled to an increase. If the carriers are not paid enough they should have their pay increased whether they earn this extra amount or not. But, as I said a moment ago, if we can make them earn more money for the Government, if we can make these routes less a burden upon the Post-Office Department, it will be easier to secure increased compensation for the carriers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that at one time they were allowed to carry packages.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. And what is the situation to-day? It frequently happens that a patron on the rural route telephones to the hardware man that he has broken his mowing machine, or that he wants this or that piece of hardware; or he will telephone to the grocery store for something. It turns out that the package weighs three pounds. It is therefore mailable, but the postage is 48 cents and so prohibitive. But being mailable, the carrier can not be employed to carry it in a private capacity. So what does happen? Why, the merchant throws in waste matter until the package weighs more than 4 pounds. Then it is not mailable and the carrier can be asked to deliver it to the farmer.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What kind of a district, with reference to country stores and villages, does the gentleman represent?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. It is made up mostly of small towns. We have no large cities.

Mr. PERKINS. What does the gentleman estimate the possible revenue to be derived by the Government?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I stated that we should soon have 50,000 of these carriers, and that a modest estimate is that on an average the carriers will earn 30 cents a day, or $1,500,000 per year.

Mr. PERKINS. A great deal more than that.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I may be in error.

Mr. PERKINS. I think it will be three times that amount.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The gentleman from New York is entirely right. What I meant to say was, that if these carriers on an average earn 10 cents per day their earnings would amount to $1,500,000; but that, in my judgment, it may fairly be estimated that they would earn, on an average, 30 cents a day, which would amount to $4,500,000 per annum. If the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] is right in the suggestion that these carriers would be called upon to do a much larger business, then this increase in the post-office revenue would be at least doubled.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Does the gentleman think that if a parcels post such as he is advocating should be established, it would later be extended to a general parcels post?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I insist that there is absolutely no connection between the two. This proposition of mine should really not be called a parcels post. It is simply a local rate on packages which are carried but a short distance and which are never carried on the railroads.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It is simply the transportation of small freight through the mail?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. That is all. It provides for carrying small packages over these rural routes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. You do not think that the system is likely to be extended over all?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. A general parcels post may be adopted, but it will never be established as a result of this legislation. There are many people who believe to-day that we ought to have penny postage on letters. I believe that the time will come at no distant day when 1 cent will carry a letter to any part of the United States. But if this change is made it will not be because of the fact that for many years the rate of postage on drop letters or local letters at post-offices where there is no city delivery has been 1 cent.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Would not the fact that the revenue is increased by this work of the carriers make it necessary that their pay should be increased?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. If these carriers earn 30 cents a day in addition as a result of this legislation, it would mean $9 per month. It does not seem to me that this would necessarily mean an increase in their salary.

Mr. GILLESPIE. If you put this increased work upon the carriers, would not you first have to compensate them in proportion?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I do not think so. We pay them now $900 per year for a full route of 24 miles. I insist that the additional work required of them to earn 30 cents a day would not prove burdensome.

Mr. GILLESPIE. If $900 is adequate compensation and no more for what they now do, if we put this additional burden upon them we should need to provide additional compensation.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I repeat that I do not think this necessarily follows.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I will ask if they are not expecting an increase under present conditions?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. It is certainly claimed by many that under existing conditions, with hay and grain as high as they are, with the expense of living as high as it is, these carriers are entitled to more pay right now. It should be remembered that under existing conditions the Government takes practically all their time. They are under the civil service. They are not permitted to engage in any outside occupation. They can not permit for love or money a passenger to ride with them over their respective routes. They must maintain two and frequently three horses. They are expected to keep their uniforms neat and their horses and vehicles in good order. There is not one of these carriers who could not readily carry 50 additional pounds of mail matter every day without inconvenience and without seriously increasing his work. In view of the demands that are made upon them, in view of the manner in which the Government hedges them about, we should pay them a reasonable living wage, and then so legislate as to develop the system and enable them to earn as much as possible for the Government.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Many of them do not drive two horses.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. That is true. It is also true that the man who drives but one horse could readily carry 50 pounds more of mail matter over his route without inconvenience.

Mr. GILLESPIE. But if this change were made they would be required to drive two horses.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Oh, I do not think there would be any such increase in the amount of business. Of course no one denies for a moment that if the business of these routes became so enormous as to require two horses where one at present is sufficient for the work, it would be the duty of Congress to share the profits with the carriers.

Mr. COOK of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. COOK of Colorado. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Vermont if he understands that the smaller merchants of his district are in favor of the passage of this bill?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. They are certainly coming to favor it. At the start I think that there was some hesitation on the part of our country merchants respecting the plan. They originally believed that there was a connection between this proposition and that of a general parcels post. I think that they feared that legislation of this kind in the end would result in the establishment of such a general parcels post as would injure them. Now, they have looked into the subject and they have changed their minds.

I remember how, about two years ago, a gentleman from an adjoining State canvassed my State, organizing the country merchants into associations and advocating strenuous opposition to a general parcels post. Within a few months, however, this same gentleman took up the proposition embraced in my bill and advocated, in public and private, the adoption of this local parcels post as being for the direct benefit of the country merchant, as well as for the farmer on these routes.

A very large proportion of the farmers in my district have telephones, and these merchants are learning that with the telephone and with a reasonable rate of postage on parcels they would be brought into close relation with the patrons of these routes.

Mr. COOK of Colorado. Then the small merchants in your district are very much different from those in Colorado. I do not think a single small merchant in my State is favorable to this bill. They believe that the tendency would be to favor the department stores in the large cities and destroy the small merchant.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Then I am sorry for the country merchant in Colorado. However, he will grow more enlightened as he sees how well the plan works in other parts of the country. He will see in the end how silly is the talk that by giving a reasonable local rate on packages to be carried over these rural routes, not to exceed on an average of 10 miles, we are plotting to destroy him.

We are having our attention called particularly to the needs of country life. President Roosevelt has submitted to us the report of the commission appointed by him to investigate the needs of country life. I believe that much good will result from the work of that commission. But while the Chief Executive is thus giving consideration to the subject of the improvement of farm life it would seem as though Congress could well afford to give heed to the unanimous request of the great body of farmers who constitute the patrons of the 40,000 rural routes that gridiron the country. This rural service was established for the farmers. The system now serves 8,000,000 people, and it is still growing. Common sense, common justice, and common business principles require that Congress take prompt action along the lines indicated by my bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 26916, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PRINTING OF HEARINGS ON FOREST-RESERVE LANDS.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk (H. Res. 562).

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be printed, in paper covers, at the Government Printing Office, 5,000 additional copies of the hearings before the House Committee on Agriculture on bills having for their object the acquisition of forest and other lands for the protection of watersheds, etc.; 4,000 copies to be delivered to the document room of the House, 1,000 to be delivered to the document room of the Senate.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Reserving the right to object, if these documents are for the benefit of Members of the House, why does the gentleman have them sent to the document room?

Mr. WEEKS. That is the proper place for them.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. No; not if they are for the benefit of Members of the House. They should go to the folding room.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not care where they go, as long as Members receive them.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Then the gentleman should have them sent to the folding room.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman modify his resolution?

Mr. WEEKS. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "document" and inserting the word "folding."

Mr. MANN. Do these hearings include the article by Chittenden?

Mr. WEEKS. They do.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 14, 1909.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Our Father in heaven, we meet here on this sacred day to fulfill a sacred mission. We are come to pay a tribute of love and respect to men who served with distinction their country in the Congress of the United States, than which no greater service, if faithfully and efficiently done, can be rendered to one's country. Teach us how to be true to ourselves, how to be patriots in times of peace, how to be philanthropists, that we may feel bound to contribute something to our neighbor, to the public weal, and to the uplift of humanity; that we may be, indeed, followers of the world's great Exemplar, and departing, leave the world a little better than we found it.

Inspire the men who shall speak here to-day that they may bring out the sterling qualities of their departed colleagues; that they may be an example to those who shall come after them. Comfort us all with the blessed hope of the immortality of the soul, and be especially near to the families who mourn the loss of their dear ones that they may look forward with bright anticipations to a world where sorrows never come, and where they shall dwell together with their loved ones forever. And glory and honor be Thine through Him who revealed the immortality of the soul to the world. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 563.

Resolved, That the business of the House is now suspended that opportunity may be given to pay tribute to his memory.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public service, the House at the conclusion of the memorial exercises of the day shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, it is with mingled feelings of sadness and hope that I undertake to pay this final tribute to my deceased friend and colleague in this body. It is with a feeling of sadness because of the loss of a companionship which I prized highly, and the memory of which I sacredly cherish. It is with a feeling of sadness because I realize that in his death his splendid family sustained the loss of a loving and devoted husband and father. It is with a feeling of sadness because by his departure the State of South Dakota lost one of its most honored, respected, and patriotic citizens, one whose bright intellect and sturdy integrity have been interwoven in many ways in the fabric of her laws and social life. It is with a feeling of hope that what has been our loss has been his gain. It is with a feeling of hope because he has departed from this world of sickness, pain, trouble, and sorrow, and has gone to a sphere of existence where these are unknown, where all is brightness and happiness and peace.

We can not approach the subject of death with aught but reverence. It is the great unexplainable mystery. Sages and philosophers for ages have vainly endeavored to discover the source of life and the effect of death. It is the secret which the Omnipotent One has wisely and mercifully withheld from us. But enough has been revealed to us that we may know that life does not end at the grave. As the new-born infant instinctively takes nourishment at the mother's breast, so every human being, though unlearned and uncultured, has within his breast the instinctive feeling of immortality. It has been said that "the gods conceal from men the happiness of death that they may endure life."

I shall allude briefly to some of those principal incidents which, like milestones, mark and indicate our lamented colleague's upright life, his noble character, and his patriotic and active civil and military service. WILLIAM H. PARKER was born May 5, 1847, enlisted in the Union Army May 27, 1861, at Portsmouth, N. H., and was mustered into service, to take effect the same date, as a musician, in Company H, Second New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, to serve three years, and was discharged from the service August 28, 1861, at Bladensburg, Md., being unfit for duty as a drummer.

He was again enrolled September 4, 1862, at Keene, N. H., and was mustered into service September 22, 1862, at Concord, N. H., as a private, Company G, Fourteenth New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, to serve three years. He was transferred some time in January or February, 1864, to Company A, Sixth Regiment Invalid Corps, which organization was afterwards designated Company A, Sixth Regiment U. S. Veteran Reserve Corps. He was mustered out of service, as of that company and regiment, April 28, 1865, at Cincinnati, Ohio, to enable him to accept promotion as second lieutenant in the Sixth U. S. Volunteer Infantry. He was mustered into service April 29, 1865, at Cincinnati, Ohio, as second lieutenant Company C, Sixth U. S. Volunteer Infantry, to serve three years, and was mustered out and honorably discharged the service with the company October 15, 1866, at Fort Kearney, Nebr. He was brevetted first lieutenant of volunteers March 13, 1865, for faithful and meritorious services.

He married Miss Clara E. Thomas, of Washington, D. C., January 27, 1867, the result of the union being 11 children, 8 of whom are living. Graduated from the law department of the Columbian University, Washington, D. C., class of 1868. Was admitted to the bar of the supreme court of the District of Columbia immediately after his graduation. Appointed collector of internal revenue of Colorado Territory by General Grant, President, June 24, 1874. Resigned July, 1876, upon his appointment as assistant United States attorney of Colorado Territory. Was subsequently appointed United States attorney of Colorado. Removed to Deadwood, Dak., July, 1877, where since said time up to the time of his death he engaged in the practice of his profession. Was elected a member of the constitutional convention of the proposed State of South Dakota June 30, 1885. November 3, 1885, was elected a member of the state senate from Lawrence County, but owing to the fact that South Dakota was not admitted as a State until 1889, he did not serve. Was elected a member of the house of representatives of South Dakota in 1880. Was elected state's attorney of Lawrence County in November, 1902, and reelected in 1904. Was elected to the Sixtieth Congress November, 1906. He departed this life at Deadwood, S. Dak., June 26, 1908, in the sixty-first year of his age.

Colonel PARKER while in this body was a member of the Committee on the Militia and of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it is somewhat indicative of the generosity of his nature and of his interest in military affairs that of the thirty-odd bills which he introduced in the last session of Congress two-thirds at least were bills either for pensions or otherwise for the relief of worthy and distressed soldiers and the widows of soldiers. His death occurred within a month after he had left Washington, where he had been in faithful attendance upon this House.

I had known Colonel PARKER for upward of twenty years, but became more intimately acquainted with him during the last year of his life. I had known him as an able lawyer, as a member of the constitutional convention, a member of the state legislature, as a worthy and respected citizen of the State. Later, upon closer acquaintance, we became friends. He was one of those friends who was such not only in fair weather, but in foul; not only in times of prosperity, but in times of adversity and of trouble. Unfortunately his continued illness during the last session of this Congress prevented him from becoming intimately acquainted with many of his colleagues. To say that he or any man is without faults would be an exaggeration.

We all have our faults. "To err is human, to forgive divine." His faults, if any, were such as are common to those of his generous nature and amiable disposition, and they were so few and of such minor importance that they were eclipsed by his many virtues as the stars are eclipsed by the noonday sun. He could not see want and distress unrelieved, even to the extent of giving his last dollar. He came always to the relief of the afflicted.

Going to the Territory of Dakota in 1877 and locating at Deadwood, then a mining camp, he was one of those hardy pioneers who materially assisted in building up a splendid Commonwealth. He was one of those who assisted in bringing order out of chaos, in subduing the lawless and turbulent element which is usually found in an early mining camp; and he lived to see it develop into the richest hundred square miles in the world, populated by a law-abiding, peaceful, industrious, and prosperous people. One might inquire why with all this opportunity he did not accumulate great wealth. The answer is very simple. His generous nature and his ever-present desire to assist others would not permit it. In the death of Colonel PARKER the State has sustained a great loss. He took an important part in framing the constitution of that State, a constitution which is generally conceded to be a model.

As a member of the state legislature he was the author of many meritorious bills which became crystallized into the laws of that State. As a lawyer he was noted for his ability as a counselor and as an advocate, as well as for his fidelity to his clients. The reports of the supreme court of the State bear evidence of his legal ability and his success at the bar of that tribunal. The Lawrence County bar, of which he was a respected member, paid a beautiful final tribute to his memory by resolutions adopted by that body. I had the honor to be a member of the committee which attended his burial service, and was impressed, as his body lay in state in the city hall of Deadwood, by the great number of sympathetic friends and neighbors who came to look for the last time upon the face of their departed friend. The ceremonies were conducted under the auspices of his old comrades, the Grand Army of the Republic.

When Colonel PARKER was elected state's attorney of Lawrence County he found that the laws prohibiting gambling and regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors were, as they had been for years, flagrantly violated. In obedience to his duty as he saw it, and with the courage to express and enforce his convictions, he closed the gambling joints and caused their apparatus to be destroyed and compelled the saloon keepers to obey the law. To him the grateful people of his county extended the due meed of praise for having suppressed and cleansed the community of these vices.

Realizing his failing health and evidently with a premonition of death, Colonel PARKER told me a few days before I left Washington for home that he had selected a site in Arlington Cemetery where he desired that he might be buried, and there in that beautiful city of the soldier dead, overlooking the placid and historic waters of the Potomac, now lie the earthly remains of my colleague.

It is only in those homes where the grim destroyer has entered that the full import of death is felt. The cheering voice is silent, the willing, helpful hands are still. The empty chair, the vacant place at the table, are silent but eloquent evidences of him who has gone. To the bereaved ones the sun does not shine as brightly or the birds sing as sweetly as before. The charms and pleasures of life have lost their attractiveness. The one who has gone before is as a magnet that calls them to heavenly thoughts and things. Yet it is not despair, but resignation. He has gone to await their coming and, with that faith in immortality which inspires hope, they know that they will meet again. We may strew his grave with beautiful flowers expressive of our love and esteem, we may here recount his virtues and his services to his country and express our sympathy to the bereaved family, but hope and comfort must come to them from a source infinitely higher than from us poor fallible mortals. I know of no more concrete, hopeful, authoritative assurance than that which is contained in the words of our Savior when he said:

> Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word and believeth on Him who sent me shall have everlasting life and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life.

The final summons came to our beloved colleague at an age when the twilight shadows of life were lengthening toward the east, and surrounded by his loved ones to whom he was so devotedly attached, he fearlessly, calmly, and peacefully entered into the great beyond. But let us indulge in the hope of a happy reunion with him and our other friends and dear ones who have gone before in a place where there are no tears and no more partings.

> Eternal Hope! when yonder spheres sublime
> Peal'd their first notes to sound the march of time,
> Thy joyous youth began, but not to fade
> When all thy sister planets have decay'd;
> When wrapt in flames the clouds of ether glow,
> And heaven's last thunder shakes the world below,
> Thou, undismay'd, shalt o'er the ruins smile,
> And light thy torch at Nature's funeral pile.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting, when one of our number lays down his work and consigns himself to the last sleep, that we pause for a brief moment and pay tribute to his memory. It is well to consider his life, his endeavors, and his achievements, that we may learn from his failures and rejoice in his successes.

We have assembled to-day to honor the memory of WILLIAM H. PARKER, of South Dakota. At the time of his death I had known him but a comparatively short time, but I had learned to regard him with the highest esteem. Born in 1847, he was but 14 years of age when the civil war broke out. He answered the call to arms, however, and gave five years of his early youth in eager, unselfish service to his country. At the end of the war he took up his work in the walks of civil life. He graduated from the law department of what was then the Columbian University in this city in 1868 and was immediately admitted to the bar. He was appointed collector of internal revenue of Colorado by President Grant in 1874, was appointed assistant United States attorney of Colorado in 1876, and was subsequently appointed United States attorney of Colorado. In July, 1877, he moved to Deadwood, Dak., and engaged in the practice of law.

His neighbors, however, soon recognized his abilities and called upon him to take part in public life. He served as a member of the constitutional convention in 1885, served as a member of the South Dakota legislature, as state's attorney of his county, and as a Member of Congress, and in every office that he was called to fill he performed his duties faithfully and did his work well. He had served but a short time in Congress when an all-wise Providence cut his life short, but his previous training in public life stood him in good stead and enabled him to do efficient work from the first. All his associates felt that had he been permitted to serve a few more years, he would have left his mark on much important legislation.

He had a keen intellect, showed marked ability as a lawyer, and was a leader of men. The high devotion to his country that he showed when, as a mere boy, he risked his life in her service was always evident in his performance of all public duties. His genial disposition won him many friends, and there are few men who go to their graves more sincerely loved and mourned by his associates than WILLIAM H. PARKER. And sincerely regretting his departure, we take leave of him with the words:

His faults write upon the sands; his virtues on the tablets of our memories.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, in earlier days in the Congress of the United States we were in the habit of stopping in the course of our business day's legislation to recount the history and speak of the character and commemorate the memory of our dead. Perhaps it is well now that we take the Sabbath day to come here for a like purpose. I was not, Mr. Speaker, intimately acquainted with the Member from South Dakota, WILLIAM H. PARKER. He came into this Congress after a long life of preparation for the work that confronted him here. I can not speak of his personal achievements in civil life nor of his long and gallant career in the Army of the Union in times of war. I knew his genial character, and I was drawn to him because he was a soldier in the Union Army in the civil war. With a rare exception here and there, he was the youngest of those who went into the civil war to fight for the preservation of the Union. A child (14 years of age), in fact, when he first enlisted in 1861, blossoming with youth and not yet into mature manhood, he went with his regiment and comrades of the State of New Hampshire to the field. Difficulties always arose in such cases with persons so young, and yet he persisted, and with a second enlistment, and so on, to the end of the civil war.

Like some others who showed their military spirit and courage in that war, he became a soldier, or, rather, an officer, in the United States Army without preparation in the military sense or in an educational sense for military duties. He became a natural soldier, and by serving in the field, in campaigns, bivouacking with the soldiers without tents, and in battle he acquired the true inspiration of an officer. His war experience stood at the close of the civil war with him for a graduation at the Military Academy at West Point. At 19 years of age he became a lieutenant in the United States Army. There were few others who went into the Regular Army under like circumstances. The present senior colonel of the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army was a marked example of a child going into the civil war and from that, with an interval in civil life, to service in the Regular Army, and he now stands as the senior colonel and quartermaster in that great department of the United States Army. I refer to Col. John L. Clem, once known as the "Drummer boy of Chickamauga." But, Mr. Speaker, we are to speak of the dead. We often hesitate and sometimes fail to stop in our daily career to honor the dead, but look forward to the living. I had a peculiar sensation come over me a few months ago when I had climbed to a mountain summit in the Yosemite Park, California, and up to the great Mariposa trees. These trees range in height from 200 to 350 feet, higher perhaps. I looked around at that marvelous growth of nature, and as I rode along I came across a great redwood tree lying prone full length upon the ground.

I looked in amazement and with mingled sorrow and regret at that lone, fallen tree which had stood through the centuries, as it lay amongst its living, standing comrades. But what a curiosity to inspect, to take its measurements in length and diameter, and see what nature had produced there in that wonderful mountain park! My interest centered around this mammoth tree, dead, decayed; but in the providence of things earthly it had fulfilled its mission and though fallen was monarch of all of them.

So we turn to those who have fallen among us here and view what they have been in life and see that they, though dead, still have fulfilled their mission on earth among men.

The last fiscal year showed that of those soldiers of the civil war who drew pensions 23,353 had died. That great, grand army of the Union is to pass away. Nature makes this inevitable. But Mr. PARKER as one of them fulfilled his duty with them and did his full share from childhood to manhood, which came early with him, and aided in accomplishing the greatest thing for civilization and humanity and personal liberty that has ever been accomplished in all the ages.

From the decrees of war, that war from 1861 to 1865, we mark a new era all around the world. We have seen, and we are still seeing, and we shall see, the glories of the things accomplished in our own country, but that does not tell half the tale. The liberty of man has extended to autocratic Russia, to other lands where oppression fell heavily upon the masses; and while we are here to-day, the people in Persia, taking spirit from what occurred here in our civil war, are fighting for civil liberty. And even the Sultan of Turkey is negotiating with the young, spirited Mohammedans and granting them a share of human liberty. This is all traceable back, in my opinion, to what was accomplished here in this land by the civil war.

I have said enough, Mr. Speaker, to bear my testimony to that highest thing incident to a citizen of our country, to wit, patriotic duty, which inspired our deceased colleague here. In the performance of duty none can stand higher than WILLIAM H. PARKER, whose life and character we commemorate here to-day.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, Col. WILLIAM H. PARKER represented the State of South Dakota as a Member of this House of Representatives only a little more than a year, when he was stricken suddenly and died on the 26th day of last June.

For twenty-eight years we had been residents of the same town and have practiced law before the same courts. In the daily life of the citizen and in the forum of the courts I have had good opportunity to test his quality as a man and public servant. He succeeded me as a Member of this body, and now, by reason of the fatality of death, I am in turn succeeding him. It is not inappropriate, therefore, that I should offer this modest tribute in his memory.

Colonel PARKER had the instincts and bearing of the soldier. The war of the rebellion was on during the years of his young manhood. He enlisted in the Union Army before that struggle had proceeded ninety days, and he was still wearing the blue when the Confederate forces surrendered under General Lee. Indeed, he continued in the Regular Army until the fall of 1866, when he resigned from the service at Kearney, Nebr. The bearing and deportment of the military gentleman remained with him to the end of his life.

The events of the war of the rebellion have long since passed into history. Let us hope that the tremendous issues involved in that mighty struggle may never be lost to the understanding and to the benefit not only of this land of ours, but of universal humanity.

Every student of our Constitution is necessarily struck with the fact, historical as it is, that in at least one particular this great instrument, this charter of liberty of our people, was the result of compromise. It is true that that compromise grew out of a condition—a condition by which much of the labor of the Southern States was performed by slaves; and it is probable—indeed, I think it is generally agreed by historians—that without the making of that compromise our Constitution would not have been formed. That compromise was to the effect that the African slave trade should continue for a period not to exceed twenty years, and that the slave condition in the particular States where it had become established as an institution might continue indefinitely. Those were the provisions placed in that immortal instrument which tended toward slavery rather than universal liberty. It was a yielding of principle to expediency. In the progress of years it became manifest, as was said by the immortal Lincoln, that this land could not permanently endure half slave and half free. Slavery was therefore the irritating cause of the rebellion, but the permanency, the existence, indeed, of the Nation itself, was the rallying call that summoned the loyal men of the North and the South to the defense of the Union.

Colonel PARKER, young man as he was, devoted more years of his life to the protection of that principle of union in this Nation than was accorded to but few patriots. That struggle developed. It cost an infinite amount of treasure. It cost in the neighborhood of a million of young lives, the very flower of the manhood of America; but it was worth all that it cost. As a result, our flag emerged from the smoke of battle to float forever over a Nation every individual of which shall be forever free. The Constitution was purged of its iniquity, and it is now one consistent whole, based upon the principles of universal liberty.

If this Constitution was worthy to be venerated before the civil war, certainly it is now entitled to the love and to the patriotic devotion of the people of our country for all time to come.

Colonel PARKER was a native of New Hampshire, and married in the city of Washington in 1867. He graduated from the law department of the Columbian University, now the George Washington University, in this city in 1868. From that time forth he became identified with the development of the West, and lived continuously in the West, first in Colorado and then in the Territory of Dakota and subsequent State of South Dakota.

It is in his profession as a practicing lawyer that Colonel PARKER is best known, and it is here that he carved out his most eminent career. He was made assistant United States attorney for Colorado Territory by President Grant in 1874, and became later United States attorney for the State of Colorado. He moved to Deadwood, in the then Territory of Dakota, in 1877, and for the thirty-one years until his death he was in the constant practice of his profession.

He was an eminent and gifted lawyer. By natural talent and education he was well equipped for his profession. An orator of ability, possessing an unerring judgment in discovering the strong points of his case, with consummate skill in the presentation of his cause to the jury, he made a most formidable legal antagonist, particularly in the trial of jury cases. His specialty was criminal law, and for years he was easily the leading criminal lawyer in western Dakota.

Near the close of his life he served two terms as state's attorney for the county in which he lived. He brought to the service of the State and county a proficiency acquired during a long career in the practice of his profession. As public prosecutor he discharged the official duties of his position with an ability and success seldom equaled and never excelled in the administration of the state's attorneyship of his county. It was during his term that a moral movement for the enforcement of the laws against gambling was undertaken and successfully prosecuted. The credit for this is due, in large part, to the courage and ability of Colonel PARKER in the fearless discharge of his duty as prosecuting attorney. The results of that movement have been far-reaching and will be permanent.

The fatal malady which overcame him was upon him for two or three weeks before his death. It was apparent to his friends and to himself that the end was at hand. His courage was unfailing. He responded to the summons of the "grim destroyer" with fortitude and confidence. He approached his grave—

> As one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him,
> And lies down to pleasant dreams.

His body rests in Arlington Cemetery, in appropriate recognition of his long and honorable service in defense of his country and in suggestive nearness to the scenes of his gallant young manhood.

RECESS.

Then, on motion of Mr. MARTIN (at 12 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.), the House stood in recess until 2 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Speaker, we have assembled here to-day to pay tribute to the memory of one of Maryland's noblest sons, the late Senator WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE, of whom it may be said in the words of Byron:

> Thy days are done, thy fame begun;
> Thy country's strains record
> The triumphs of her chosen son.

His life was like a shining star in the firmament of Maryland's history. It shed the luster of nobility of character and force in every sphere of public and private activity in which this strong and good man entered. Governor WHYTE's influence for good did not end with his life. Like a comet which in its rush through space leaves a streak of light in its trail, so his life which pulsated with goodness and strength has after its extinction left a beacon for the guidance of those who were not vouchsafed the God-given powers which were his.

In my boyhood days it was my good fortune, as friend of his sons, to be a welcome guest at his old-fashioned home in Baltimore. His hospitality to all who passed his door, and especially to the young, was as warm as it was spontaneous. It was during these visits that I was struck with the extraordinary strength of his devotion to his family and friends. To sacrifice his own comfort for the happiness of those about him was to him a pleasure. It was then also that I observed those marked characteristics which were exemplified in his conduct throughout his long and useful life—his goodness and his strength, and exquisite and most harmonious blending of the finest qualities of heart and head. Strong enough himself to mock at the temptations and the great and petty vices to which big as well as little men easily fall victims, he was yet big-hearted enough and sympathetic enough to look charitably upon the frailties and weaknesses of those who were not blessed with his wonderful self-control and powerful moral and intellectual discipline. He was strong enough to be self-denying in his habits, but he was too human and too broad to permit self-denial and self-sacrifice to degenerate into asceticism. Indeed, few men I know were more sociable than he. And though he was too strong to require the diversion and recreation which most men regard as essential, he was too broad not to recognize why others weaker than himself did need them.

It was not strange, then, that a man whose private life was an exemplification of the noblest attributes of the loving father, the devoted husband, and the faithful friend should have discharged his public duties with the fidelity and the ability that have earned for him the affectionate appellation, "The Grand Old Man of Maryland." At the age when most boys are still at school Governor WHYTE was obliged to begin his career in a countinghouse as a bookkeeper. His work there, though still a lad of 18, showed that thoroughness which in his later career blossomed forth into that masterful faculty to go to the bottom of every difficult problem with which his powerful mind was required to grapple. But the routine and the limitations of the countinghouse life were not compatible with the tastes and the aspirations which this youth had probably inherited from his maternal grandfather, the great William Pinkney. He therefore turned from the trials and tribulations of trade to the more exacting and more exciting life which the law holds out. Governor WHYTE's training as a law student was in most capable hands. But while I do not wish to detract from the credit that may probably be due to those who were intrusted with Governor WHYTE's legal training, I am not inclined to attribute his magnificent career largely to that training.

We must remember that we are dealing with a rare individuality—an individuality which does not suffer itself to be submerged by initial handicaps, nor one that sends its possessor to greater heights because of initial advantages. At the outset of his legal career it was soon recognized that this young lawyer possessed a power of application, a thoroughness of method, a luminousness and strength of intellect that would make him a worthy son of the State that has given us a Wirt, a Pinkney, a Taney, a Nelson, and a Johnson. The promise of his early life was fulfilled by the performance of his later career. In 1847 we see him for the first time in the rôle of public servant, when this young man of 23 served a term in the lower branch of the Maryland legislature. Thereafter, until his death while a Member of the United States Senate, his public services and activities are so wrapped up and interwoven with the annals of our own State that when we read its history we are bound to learn much of this beautifully rounded life. Six years after his election to the legislature we find him as state comptroller, utilizing his experience as an expert accountant in placing that important office upon a basis which, since that time, it has been necessary to change but little.

The admirable system which he established in that office and the excellent manner in which he fulfilled his responsibilities elicited high praise from the legislature of his State. In 1868 we see Governor WHYTE in the United States Senate, the worthy successor of Reverdy Johnson, who was called to other fields of usefulness. With the hand of the master, we see this comparatively young man curbing the bitter feelings and passions of partisanship and upholding the waning influence and dignity of a coordinate branch of the Government. He was fearless enough to enter the lists with such master minds as Wade, Cameron, Sumner, Conkling, Edmunds, Morton, and Conness, and he was strong enough to carry the day. There he stood, as he had always stood since that time, for the supremacy of constitutional principle against the exaltation of personal and party passion, for the equal dignity and preservation of every coordinate branch of the Government against the usurpations and the arrogance of power by any one of them. This was the first supreme test of his fearlessness and statesmanship, and he measured up to it nobly. Three years after his appointment to the Senate Mr. WHYTE was elected governor of his State, and in 1874 we find him again in the United States Senate. This time he was sent there by a legislature of which I had the honor to be a member for a full term of six years.

After the expiration of his first term we find him declining a reelection to that august body. This refusal of one of the greatest honors which a State can confer upon its worthy son was not prompted by what we could justly consider as a proper motive, the desire to provide for himself that competence to which his magnificent powers entitled and assured him, but because of the illness of his wife. So that when we look at any period of this full and tirelessly active career we find that Governor WHYTE's energies were stimulated by his devotion to his family and his finely developed sense of responsibility to his fellow-citizens.

There can be no nobler example of this keen sense of responsibility to the public than his public career offers after his retirement from the Senate in 1880. Some men, after having enjoyed the highest favors which a discriminating electorate can bestow, are not content to serve their fellow-citizens in a capacity less exalted than that in which they formerly represented them. We are accustomed to look upon this weakness as one of the foibles of great men. With Governor WHYTE, however, it was not so. In 1881 the exigencies of public life required him to serve as Baltimore's mayor. In 1900 he was called to be its city solicitor. To him the call of his fellow-citizens was the equivalent of a sacred command. And he sanctified those offices, high in themselves but minor in their nature when likened to those which he had formerly filled, with the same nobility of purpose, the same inexorable rectitude, the same high powers that characterized his conduct in the governor's chair and in the national forum at Washington.

Of his splendid successes as a lawyer and an orator it is sufficient to say that he was a noble successor and representative of Maryland's famous line of lawyers. To him the profession of the law was a sacred calling, not a means for enrichment, followed during the intervals in which his manifold public duties did not absorb his attention, for throughout his long and useful life his private interests were subordinated to the requirements of public responsibility. It was therefore a crowning tribute to his worth and a striking manifestation of the gratitude of his fellow-citizens when the governor of his State appointed him to fill out the unexpired term of the late Senator Gorman and when the action of the governor was stamped with the people's approval when the legislature of Maryland in 1908 elected him to the same office. An affectionate father, a devoted husband, a faithful friend, a brilliant lawyer, and a fearless and splendid public servant—in short, a strong and a good man—this is what Governor WHYTE was. It is the achievement of men such as he was that inspire the well-known and beautiful strain:

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.

Footprints that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother
Seeing, might take heart again.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting and appropriate that the Members of this House, especially of the State of Maryland, should speak of the life and character of WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE, late a Senator from the State of Maryland. I offer no excuse for adding a word of tribute to his memory, although I had no close personal acquaintance with him. I knew his public history, his splendid life history, and that covered a long and successful career. I knew his character and reputation, that which attaches to a man by what we call "word of mouth." That is always truthful, no matter what the public prints may contain with reference to the individual considered.

I have a very warm feeling for the State of Maryland and her people. Almost one hundred years ago (1811) my father started from the heights around Antietam Creek, Maryland, from the then village of Sharpsburg, to the West. He carried with him the plain, simple, sturdy nature that belonged to the people with whom he had lived from birth to a period of about 27 years of age. I had the honor of commanding for almost two years one of Maryland's most gallant regiments—the Sixth Maryland Volunteers—that fought for the preservation of the Union. These things make me feel as though it was highly appropriate that I should say a word for the distinguished deceased Maryland Senator. In order that there may be no mistake about the description and history of this distinguished man, I now ask the Clerk to read from the Congressional Directory that story of his life and career therein contained, which, though not necessarily written by Senator WHYTE, we all know must have had his approval as to its essential accuracy. It is mere statement or recital and not eulogistic, yet a good, though far from full, summary of his life and career.

The Clerk read as follows:

WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE, Democrat, of Baltimore, was born in Baltimore, Md., August 9, 1824. His grandfather, Dr. John Campbell White, a native of Ireland, and one of the United Irishmen of 1798, came to America in 1800; his maternal grandfather was William Pinkney, of Maryland, who died while United States Senator from that State in 1822; he was educated by M. R. McNally, a distinguished scholar, who had been secretary of the first Napoleon. From 1842 to 1844 he was engaged in mercantile pursuits in the countinghouse of Peabody, Riggs & Co., of Baltimore, of which house George Peabody was the founder; studied law in Baltimore, and finished his legal education at the law school of Harvard University in the class of 1844–45; was admitted to the bar in 1846 and practiced his profession in Baltimore; was judge-advocate of a court-martial at the Naval Academy in 1848. He was a representative of Baltimore City in the legislature of Maryland in 1847 and 1848; was elected comptroller of the treasury of Maryland in 1853, serving until 1855, when he declined a reelection; was a candidate for Congress in 1857 against the Know-Nothings and contested the seat of the sitting Member on account of fraud and violence at the election, and the Committee on Elections reported a resolution declaring the seat vacant, but it was laid on the table by a vote 100 to 105. He was a delegate to the Democratic national convention of 1868, which nominated Horatio Seymour for President; in the same year he was appointed by the governor United States Senator to fill the vacancy caused by the appointment of Reverdy Johnson as minister to Great Britain; in 1871 he was elected governor of Maryland for four years, but resigned in 1874 to enable the legislature to elect his successor, on his own election to the United States Senate for a full term from 1875 to March 3, 1881, to succeed William T. Hamilton, as a Democrat. In 1881, on his retirement from the Senate, he was elected mayor of Baltimore, without opposition.

In 1887 he was elected attorney-general of Maryland, serving until 1891. He was appointed by President Harrison a delegate to the congress of South American Republics, but declined on account of professional engagements. During the years 1897 and 1898 he was chairman of a commission, established by the city, to frame a new charter for the city of Baltimore. In 1874, in the boundary dispute between Maryland and Virginia, he appeared by appointment of the governor as counsel for his State before the arbitration board, composed of Judge Jeremiah S. Black; Governor Jenkins, of Georgia; and Senator Beck, of Kentucky. In the same year the degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by the University of Maryland, and subsequently he received a like degree from St. John's College. In 1900 he was appointed city solicitor of Baltimore, which office he resigned in 1903; was appointed June 8, 1906, by the governor of Maryland, United States Senator, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. Arthur Pue Gorman, and took his seat June 11, to serve until the legislature of Maryland shall elect a successor for the unexpired term, ending March 3, 1909.

When the Democratic state convention, on August 8, 1907, adopted the plan of selecting nominees for United States Senators and declared by unanimous resolution that it should be binding on the Democrats elected in any county or district to the next legislature to cast their votes for the candidates for United States Senator who shall have received the greatest number of votes cast at such primary election in such county or district, he announced his candidacy for the balance of the term to succeed himself. He received 66,290 votes at the primary, carrying every county and district in the State without opposition, insuring his election in January, 1908. His term of service will then expire March 3, 1909.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE died a United States Senator March 17, 1908, at the age of almost 84 years. Such a long life is rarely allotted to man; and to live in this Republic for such a period is to have lived through the best and most important period of the world's history. I have often reflected over the matter of the greatness of individual men of the present day compared with that of times gone by. We are apt to minimize our own great men. It was not hard, Mr. Speaker, for a man to be great in barbaric or semibarbaric times, nor yet to be great in the bursting out of civilization in Europe, when it came first out of the forests of Germany and France and from early tribal relations. A great Saxon, or, indeed, a great Roman, always had behind him masses that were of the commonest, illiterate class. When we come to our own period, we find that a great man has to be great among greatness, and when we speak of WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE as a great man of his day and generation, we must remember his ancestry and the great men all around him. He came from a good ancestry, a great ancestry, I can truthfully say, on both his maternal and paternal sides. William Pinkney, a great statesman, lawyer, and early patriot of this country, died while a United States Senator, in 1822, two years before the birth of WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE, his grandson.

WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE grew up among the learned men of his State and country and had to compete with them in mercantile relations, in social relations, in general business relations, as an attorney and counselor at law and as a statesman, and in all these things he stood with the stronger and greater of them. He succeeded in the United States Senate at one time Reverdy Johnson, a great Marylander, respected and known all over the country as a great patriot-statesman. The statesmen of Maryland of the time of the civil war had their difficulties multiplied somewhat over that of great men and statesmen in some of the Northern States. Maryland was a border slave State, and when the civil war came that was to try the strength of our constitutional unity, they had difficulties to overcome, perhaps prejudices, that did not attach to men of other parts of the United States. These men in the light around them and with the conditions about them did their duty to their country through the civil war and since the civil war, and while I belong and have belonged to a party opposed to the one to which WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE was always attached, I have always had the most profound respect for his character and for the character of his associates in his own State. We are here, then, Mr. Speaker, to-day simply to testify to one of our great statesmen. A Member from Maryland speaks properly of WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE as belonging to the State of Maryland, but he belonged to the Union—to the great American Republic.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, we are called upon once more to speak of the illustrious dead.

The late Senator WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE was of a most distinguished lineage. His grandfather, William Pinkney, was, in his time, the leader of the American bar. Chief Justice Taney, who had listened to arguments by Luther Martin, Daniel Webster, and the other giants of the time, declared he had never heard Mr. Pinkney's equal; and he was as pre-eminent as a statesman as he was as a lawyer. Senator WHYTE, if he had one ambition, wanted to equal the standard set by his great ancestor, and no one who knew him doubts that he, in a very great degree, realized his ambition, for he was undoubtedly eminently safe as a counselor, one of the most brilliant advocates in his State, and, before a jury, without a peer. The story of his life for its last fifty years is the history of Maryland, and his death closed a great career, which has had few like it in the history of the State he loved and served so well. While many years of his long life were occupied in public office, he was not regarded as an ambitious or self-seeking man, and I personally believe that with the exception of his election as governor and his first election by the legislature to the Senate, the offices he held, in my time at least, came to him because he was worthy of them, and men knew he could be trusted and delighted in honoring him, without effort on his part.

Of his integrity there has never been a suspicion or shadow of doubt, and he discharged the duties of every office to which he was elected or appointed without one adverse criticism. No man ever heard an official act of the late WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE censured. Always correct, always honest, he served the people faithfully. He was singularly free from avarice or greed, and never appeared to consider the profits of an office as worthy of his attention, and it has been most frequently commented upon by those who knew that his legal fees were out of all proportion to the eminent services rendered his clients.

In his private life Senator WHYTE was pure and blameless. As a Christian gentleman he was without reproach, with convictions of the life to come and the truths of his religion, which were ever firm and unshaken. He was charitable beyond his means. Most undoubtedly his last election to the Senate was the cause of the greatest gratification to him. Coming as it did, unanimously, in his old age, it showed that although naturally a man of his character had made enemies and known opposition during certain periods of his long and splendid life, at the end he not only was the best known, but the best loved man in Maryland, which was a fitting crown of a life largely devoted to the public service of his State and country.

His death caused more than a mere passing regret, for he had won a warm and loving place in every Maryland heart, even among those who did not know him personally, and there was among our people a feeling of genuine grief when he passed away.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, in this day of our witness to the memory of Senator WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE I leave to my colleagues more fortunate in his close personal acquaintance the tributes of intimate and affectionate association. The State of Maryland is doubly dear to my heart as the scene of my earliest recollections and boyhood days and as the field of my activities, as well as the birthplace of many of my ancestors of sacred memory. As a son of Maryland I have taken pride in the achievements of Senator WHYTE and a delight in helping to honor him. On the several occasions when I called on him for assistance in the passage of bills introduced by me I always found him willing and ready to help.

As a man of high aims and ideals, as a citizen of great legal and statesmanlike attainments and experience, Senator WHYTE was exceptionally distinguished. He was such a man as the citizens of any State might be proud to honor, and in giving him so many marks of their esteem and confidence, my fellow-citizens of Maryland and of the country were reflecting honor on themselves. That they were justified in their choice, that he was tried and never found wanting, the open book of his life and high-honored career amply testifies.

You have heard of the great and stirring events in which he figured. Let me dwell upon what is to me the greatest lesson of his life, the thing for which I revere him most, and which, in my opinion, should be the greatest cause of sorrow at his loss.

By heritage and birth he came to us from our revolutionary fathers, and he was thus a link which bound us to the glorious past; but even more by the cast and bent of his mind he stood for those things which make the glory of the past and the crown of our forefathers; they gave us of their best in giving us the Constitution, and it was for this best that Senator WHYTE stood, and which made him such a strong link and such a representative one between the times of our forefathers and these our days. He was always for the Constitution; for the Constitution as it is, and not as we would make it; his best thought, his deepest and most profound convictions, the essence of his life, were given to the upholding of that instrument, and some of the most noteworthy speeches he uttered were in defense of its integrity and plain intention.

We have fallen upon restless times, and we scarcely know wherein we stand from day to day in the fierce cross currents of opinion on our representative institutions and the framework of our Government. We are mightily rocked in the sea of interpretations and all but drowned in the torrents of authority. But the steadfastness of Senator WHYTE was as a beacon light in such times, a clear, cold light to give courage and hope of succor. He had infinite faith in the fundamental law and its plain interpretation; faith in the intention of the people to place power only in the hands of their chosen representatives as a bulwark against encroachments from whatsoever source. He withstood the storms of opinion like a mighty oak and defended the rights and liberties of the people, who instinctively trusted and honored him.

Strict constructionist he may have been; conservative and wise we knew him to be; but we wish from our hearts that there were more of him in these fevered days. His loss is a great one to his people and to his State, but a greater to the institutions he so fittingly represented and so eloquently defended. At the passing of such a man I could cry out with David, lamenting over Saul, "How are the mighty fallen!" did I not know that his spirit lives on; that the things he stood for will be the better for his labors; that the true representative government he pleaded for and prayed for will be the more able to outlast the storms beating down from high places.

Because his life meant all this, because he died while serving his people and country in a capacity he loved, and because his lesson and his influence will live on we revere him and give testimony here to-day, from full hearts, of the love we bore him and of the honor and respect in which his memory is held.

Mr. CHANEY.

There is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore;
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine for evermore.

At the Republican convention of Indiana last spring ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK was there, as he had been many times in his life, contributing his advice and enthusiasm to the great party to which we belong in preparation for another great campaign. We parted with him in the lobby of the New Claypool Hotel, Indianapolis, expecting to meet him in this Chamber in a day or two to resume the duties here, when, instead, a message came on the swift wings of the lightning telling us that "ABE BRICK is dead." Though sudden and stunning the shock to us, what a blow it was to the wife and daughter, who were also waiting contentedly for his return to Washington. They are entitled to our sympathy, and we mourn with them.

In the midst of life we are in death.

But forty-eight years had passed with Mr. BRICK. He was endowed with a physical constitution equal to any of us, so that it might reasonably be expected many more years would be meted out to him. He was an Indianian, born under the skies of that great State, and possessed, in a superior degree, that milk of human kindness which true Hoosiers always share. He was richly blessed with a splendid human nature, and he believed in his fellow-men. He was not without his faults, like everybody else, yet he was esteemed for his loyal friendships and his good will to men. A man of entirely holy instincts would not be of the earth earthy, would not be sociable, could not be companionable, and hardly endurable. Perfection is beyond our reach. We love a man who is also touched with our infirmities.

Man hath two attendant angels
Ever waiting at his side;
With him where'er he wanders,
Wheresoe'er his feet abide.

* * * *

One to warn him if he darkleth,
And rebuke him if he stray;
One to leave him to his nature
And so let him have his way.

The subject of our sketch was christened with an honored name. Abraham Lincoln was the greatest American citizen. His life was full of trials and duties, but he conscientiously served his day and generation. His life exemplified the inspiring hope that—

For every tear there are a thousand smiles;
For every sorrow there are a thousand joys;
For every vicious thought there are a thousand generous impulses;
For every crime there are a thousand heroic deeds;
For every lie there are a thousand truths;
For every error there are a thousand righteous calculations;
For every mistake there are a thousand perfections;
For every sin there are a thousand redemptions;
For every sinner there are a thousand upright men.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK had confidence in the human race. The district which he served so long and so well had faith in him, and recognized his ability, his industry, and his fidelity; and the Congresses in which he served have entered upon their imperishable records "Duty well done."

Mr. BRICK came to Congress a well-equipped lawyer and a man of affairs. He had habits of industry, without which no man ever succeeds. He applied himself with assiduity to the tasks of statesmanship and established himself in the hearts of his colleagues, where appreciation is never won without merit. He had literary tastes of a high order, and his life was embellished with the inspiration of the pure and beautiful. He was wont to ask the gentle traveler, "Who hast wandered through the world and seen the sweetest flowers blow and brightest gliding rivers, of the fairest land his eyes hath seen?" and to ask the child, "Where nature is most blest and fair?" and to get the answer that "It is where those we love abide. Though that space be small, it is ample above kingdoms; though it be a desert, through it runs the river of Paradise, and there are the enchanted bowers."

The United States was his country, Indiana was his beloved State, and South Bend his honored home. To his country he yielded patriotic devotion; to his State he gave a full measure of service and appreciation; in his home love asserted and maintained its mild dominion. He would not have it asserted that he possessed all the virtues and graces of life, but that his ambitions were honorable, his life creditable, his impulses exalting and not groveling. He always stripped the calendars of the dead December and threw the husk away; and he always looked beyond the phosphor wisp that seeks to comfort only the barren moors of life to the brilliancy of the sun on the highlands a little way ahead. And so it is that men come and go; for a little while they wear the masks of a choice endeavor, then hasten on to the reward their deserts win.

We have but recently closed a century of the world's progress and noted the achievements of civilization. We have just dried our eyes upon the century of Lincoln's birth and eulogized the triumphs of this matchless man of the people. With handkerchiefs to our faces we stand on the floor of the House of Representatives to-day mourning with a stricken family, but with pride in our hearts that another son of Indiana has shed the luster of an honorable service in the high councils of our national life. His achievements were worthy, his life successful.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK was a Republican in our politics. He believed in the doctrine that all men are created equal and equally endowed with inalienable rights. He believed in giving to every man an equal chance in the race of life with every other man. He believed in the schoolhouse and in intelligent liberty. He believed in one and the same law for rich and poor, high and low, white and black. He believed in progress, and hailed every progressive thing. He believed in American ideals, and cherished the hope that each succeeding year should outcivilize the old year. He contributed his humble part in the succession of great achievements while he sojourned here. He honored his country, his State, his neighbors, and he left an honorable name to our common civilization.

We bore his mortal remains to his beloved city, and left him with his friends, whom he loved and who loved him in return.

Peace to his ashes! A page to his memory, a tablet to his worth, a blessing on his household, and hail and farewell!

Adelaide Proctor has touched the real graces in Per Pacem ad Lucem and fittingly spread the aroma of the life of our deceased friend—

I do not ask, O Lord, that life should always be a pleasant road;
I do not ask that Thou shouldst take from me aught of its load.
I do not ask that flowers should always spring beneath my feet.
Too well I know the poison and the sting of things too sweet.

* * * * * * *

I do not ask that Thou should always shed full radiance here;
Give but a ray of peace that I may walk without a fear.
Joy is like restless day, but peace divine like quiet night.
Lead me, O Lord, till perfect day shall shine through peace to light.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, it has ever been the custom of civilized nations to mingle with their sorrow commemoration of the noble qualities of the dead. It is fitting that those who have served their country in public life, and especially those who have died while in that service, should have accorded them some permanent memorial of the personal regard and esteem felt by those who were associated with them and of the events in which they played so large and useful a part. The time-honored and beautiful custom of Congress enables us to turn aside for a brief period from the active and laborious routine of legislation and to give voice to our mingled feelings of sorrow and respect for our late lamented colleague and friend, Hon. ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK.

Born on May 27, 1860, in St. Joseph County, Ind., where to-day his ashes rest, he knew by experience the hardships and privations of the struggles of an ambitious son of the Middle West. His early education was in the public schools of his native county, and he graduated with honor from the high school of South Bend. With an ambition for a higher and broader education, with the determination to prepare himself more thoroughly for the active and responsible duties of his chosen profession, he sought the advantages of courses at Cornell, Yale, and Ann Arbor. He graduated from the latter institution and returned to his native county and entered the struggle for a practice in his profession.

Three years later he was elected to the office of prosecuting attorney, and his faithful discharge of its responsible and multifarious duties gave early promise of the capable and conscientious manner in which he performed the duties of the high office which he was later called to fill. His close application to his books, his painstaking attention to details, his fidelity to his clients, his strict integrity and charming personality brought him clients and enabled him to establish a large and lucrative practice. He was skilled in the trial of causes, courteous to his opponents, respectful to the court, and frank and open in his arguments to the jury. With these exceptional qualities, it is not surprising that his services were always in demand in important cases, and he leaves a name that will long be honored by the bar of northern Indiana.

As is usual in our State, the lawyer is called upon to participate in political battles, and Mr. BRICK rendered great service to his party in each campaign. His natural oratorical talent, his trained logical mind, quick in its analysis of public questions, his beautiful diction, his practical illustrations, and his passionate and enthusiastic appeals in behalf of Republican policies and principles made him the leading figure of his party in a district that had for years been the storm center of Indiana politics.

Mr. BRICK was not only a fighter on the firing line, but his advice was sought and followed in the councils of his party, both locally and in the State. In recognition of these qualities, he was nominated and elected to the Fifty-sixth Congress, and continued an uninterrupted service for nearly ten years, the longest period served by any Representative from his district.

His constituency looked with favor upon his ability and faithfulness, and loyally gave him their support each time he sought reelection. As a Member of this House, he was placed upon important and responsible committees, and served with distinction on the Committee on Territories, on Naval Affairs, and later upon the Appropriations. Everyone familiar with the business of this branch of Congress knows that these committees have to deal with the most comprehensive and intricate subjects of legislation, and exact of their membership the strictest application and industry. To these duties Mr. BRICK contributed his talents with unwavering fidelity. He shrank from no sacrifices, and never hesitated to give his time and mind to the labor of these committees. He sought no public display of the result of this work, and was always modest and unpretending in his intercourse with his fellow-Members. He but seldom took part in the debates on the floor, not because he was not equipped with knowledge of the subject and able to present his views with vigor and effect, but rather because he was diffident and retiring by nature, and of a demeanor and temperament which induced him to refrain from lifting his voice in debate and to exert his influence and impress his ideas in the committee room, where in fact all important, and particularly constructive, legislation is in reality framed. The services rendered by a Member of this House to his constituency and the country are not measured by the number of bills he introduces, nor in any sense determined by the speeches he delivers. The greatest and most lasting results are accomplished by earnest efforts in the committee, where learning, ability, and devotion to the best interests of the country, such as possessed by our departed friend, have their best opportunity to mold legislation and permanently to leave their impress upon the destinies of the Republic.

While it was through politics that Mr. BRICK secured his advancement and preferment, nevertheless, he was a politician in the highest and broadest sense of that term. "A politician" does not mean in its proper sense one whose aims and ambitions are solely selfish and who seeks only his own advancement without regard to means or methods employed, but rather one who has an intense interest in governmental affairs, fixed ideas as to policies and principles, ability to command the respect and win the confidence of men, and who seeks place and power in the hope that he can be of larger service to his fellow-men. With no other thought than the public good, no other ambition than the faithful performance of his duty, the politician is merged into the statesman, and such a politician and such a statesman was ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK.

It is impossible to state in formal phrase the many noble qualities that made up his splendid manhood, kindness, generosity, a loving disposition and an engaging personality. He had no malice in his heart toward any man, no envy in his thoughts, no treason in his dealings with his fellow-men. He was happy when helping others, and he had an unfailing charity toward all.

I was a member of the congressional committee appointed to attend the funeral of our late colleague, and I witnessed the solemn and impressive ceremonies with which his body was laid to rest. I noted the sincere grief felt by the people of his district over his death. Factories were closed, business was suspended, schools were dismissed, and the streets were for squares thronged with those who sought to pay their last tribute to their departed fellow-citizen. Persons of all ranks and classes jostled elbows in that crowd, and mingled the expressions of heartfelt sorrow that each felt in his death and their admiration and love for his splendid character.

The people of his city had honored him in life, and they did not fail in his death to breathe the tenderest sentiments of affection and sympathy over his remains. No matter what the memorial shaft chosen to mark his grave may be, no matter how long it endures the elements and mutely stands bearing testimony of the departed, longer still shall his memory be cherished and shall the spirit of the man that was and the good he wrought live in the hearts of the people whom he served. In the words of Tacitus—

> Whatever we have loved in Agricola, whatever we admired in him, remains and shall remain in the minds of men, in the duration of the ages, and the renown of great events.

The last word is said. Human hands can do no more; human sympathy can share but never still the pangs of broken hearts.

I append portions of the beautiful tribute to Mr. BRICK delivered by the Rev. Henry Webb Johnson, pastor of the Presbyterian Church of his home city, who was his lifelong friend and neighbor:

> TEXT.—Seest thou a man diligent in business? he shall stand before kings. (Proverbs, xxiii: 29.)
> I said to a friend a moment ago that I could hardly realize that our friend is gone. The letter that I hold in my hand, received from him a few days ago, makes it difficult for me to realize that he is not with us. When he wrote it he was in the prime and splendor of his powers. A deep shadow is upon our city. A life work is done. While the years of our fellow-citizen have not been many his labors have been multiform. We are never to measure a life by its years, but by the noble deeds performed. Achievements measure the value of a life.
> Behind the success of our fellow-citizen there were years of preparation. He was born under the sky of our county. Many here to-day have watched his movements and marked his progress from his very cradle. In the early years there was born in his heart an ambition to make something of himself. He thirsted for knowledge. To acquire an education he was willing to cross every rough sea and to climb every lofty height. The great statesman after whom he was named on his way from the log cabin to the White House never worked harder for an education than did Mr. BRICK, our fellow-citizen and friend. He was endowed with large natural gifts, but he well knew that the most royal talent must have discipline and culture. Our Angelos who chisel our marble, our Raphaels who paint our pictures, our Shakespeares who write our poetry, our orators who speak for us in the name of liberty must toil long and patiently. Without diligence our feet shall never stand in the presence of kings.
> He possessed in a high degree the literary instinct, and wielded a graceful pen. His was a brilliant imagination, and he was a poet in temperament. He drank of the wells of a Byron and of a Burns and of a Charles Lamb. Charles Lamb appealed to him most strongly. His crumbs were better than some men's whole loaves. The fact that Charles Lamb cared so patiently for his invalid sister clothed his essays and poems with new charms for Mr. BRICK. In conversation once with my friend, I told him an incident that was associated with Mr. Lamb that affected him deeply. Poets, orators, artists, and authors were once dining with Mr. Lamb. As the conversation flagged one of them said, "What would you do, Mr. Lamb, if William Shakespeare were to step into our presence?" He replied, "I would stand to my feet and exclaim, 'All hail, thou greatest of poets!'" "But what would you do if the Christ of the New Testament should come into this room?" He replied, "Of course, I should receive Him upon my knees."

> When he had achieved an honorable fame among the great men of the Nation, then did he stand before kings. There are real kings who do not wear crowns and waive scepters and live in palaces. The words "Seest thou a man diligent in business? he shall stand before kings," are fulfilled when we stand in the presence of true greatness.
> But what a friend was he. What a patriot. How loyal to the friends he loved. Warm in his sympathies, appreciative of the smallest kindness. A gentleman in his instincts. He had his faults, but his good qualities overbalanced his bad qualities. We shall miss his genial personality and his manly presence. We are all glad that we have known him. What a spontaneous tribute to his memory do we see here to-day. His distinguished associates in Congress are here to pay the final tribute of their affection and appreciation. With thousands of fellow-citizens I passed through the court-house yesterday, where his body lay in state. Every man, woman, and child was sympathetic. I was impressed with the beautiful flags that made the very air throb with patriotism. Let us clothe him with the flag of his country, which he loved, to which he was so true, and for which he would have died, and let us weave another flag, the flag of charity, out of our heart's best affection, and throw its folds around him. With these two flags let him rest.

> O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes allotted me I shall speak of Mr. BRICK, not as a Representative, although I regarded him one of the ablest Members in this House; nor as a lawyer who came here with a reputation second to none in the section of Indiana where he resided; nor as an affectionate husband and devoted father whose life seemed wrapped up in the daughter of whose mental gifts he was so justly proud; nor as the friend of his constituents, whose respect, shown to his memory by crowded streets and a thronged procession on the funeral day, indicated that they, among whom he was born, understood the rare qualities of his head and heart.

But I shall speak of him rather as one whom I knew with something of the intimacy that one mind knows another after each, with absolute candor, has exposed its inmost thoughts. For six or seven years ABE and I lived at the same hotel. Many evenings were we together. Before an open, crackling wood fire, comfortably seated in rocking chairs, with the blue smoke of our cigars curling and circling about us, we talked of men, of books, of nature, and of eternity. He was a lover of the best literature. His tranquil and pretty home in South Bend, with its large and carefully selected library, showed that he wrought in the pure literary spirit.

A delicate and an acute critic of style, his discussion of it vividly illustrated by recitals that seemed to blend them with his own words, made an hour as enjoyable as the talk of George William Curtis in the old "Easy Chair" of Harper's Weekly. An index to his taste is found in the scrapbook, which he guarded with the jealous care that a Lassan protects his holy city, and which is a storehouse of thoughts that can never die. Poetry, art, letters, the higher politics, take their place freely and naturally beside philosophy, morals, and history, but in it are pasted only the selections that show careful and conscientious work, critical discrimination, and the dainty form that culture gives to written words. No one can turn the pages of this rare book without recognizing scrupulous attention to a very high standard. It revealed his mental appetite, his aspirations, the thoroughness of his training, and the constancy of his moral impulse. Judged by its standards, and by the unfailing self-respect that characterized his thoughts in heart-to-heart conversations, he was as anxious to be right as he was determined in what he had decided to be right.

His personality counted for much. He was of a singularly simple and consistent nature, sincere and kind, and sensitively sympathetic. Free from bitterness, without varying moods, and nursing neither prejudices nor resentments, one felt in intercourse with him only the substance and reality of companionship.

Those who entered his inner life felt the charm of an open mind, vigorous and sane, which loved to analyze men of achievement, getting at the spring from which they drank, finding the secret of their strength, and tracing in the mastery of their work the influence of obstacles which they encountered. He was an optimist as well as an idealist. That is to say, he believed in the best, declaring that it was imperative always to pursue it and possible ultimately to attain it. This could be gathered from the range of his subjects disclosed in the scrapbook, as well as from his talk, illustrated with the aid of a memory as sound as it was ready, showing his wide reading and the ease with which his mind assimilated and made it his own.

Mr. BRICK liked nature. He took his rooms on the west side of the hotel that he might have a glimpse of McPherson Park, a miniature mixture of the choicest trees, the tenderest shrubs, and the most delicate flowers in Washington. He loved to be alone in the country. The trees were company enough. A little pond with its tiny ripples, a babbling brook, the ever-changing clouds floating above him, or the cattle on a distant hill bathed in the sunlight satisfied him. He once told me of a visit to Atlantic City, where he did nothing for a week but look out upon the ocean and watch the waves chase each other to the shore. He was particularly susceptible to a sunset. He loved the twilight, the tinkle of the bell upon the returning herd, and the shadowy outline of a church thrusting its steeple above the fresh foliage. At such moments he was in imagination at Stoke Pogis, and the stanzas of Gray's Elegy came involuntarily to his lips. But he also enjoyed the wild.

The low threatening cloud, the raging storm, the wild swaying of the trees, and the downpour of the rain held him by the hour at the window as in a trance. He easily yielded to the influence of untamed nature, which requires supreme effort to know. He had seen little or nothing of it himself. Our midnight climb a year ago last summer to the summit of Haleakala, on one of the Hawaiian Islands, was the most adventurous event of his life, he said; but his love for the wild took him in thought among mountain peaks where only the eagle lives, through Alaskan winters and their strenuous conditions, and with Rudyard Kipling into the attractive life of the jungle. The Call of the Wild interested him because it harked back to the original in nature, showing in animals, perhaps, the inherent governing qualities that dominate men when isolated from the ripening and refining influences that make for civilization and peace. To him White Fangs, representing the wild in its evolution, likewise appealed. The cruel pictures did not please, nor the impossible feats of strength, but the wild, strange life, thrust into sight like an upheaval of ice churned and stiffened into fantastic shapes, riveted his thought upon the war that goes on among the survival of nature's fittest.

He might be called a "gentle Elia;" yet he was not wholly content with literature as a mere source of enjoyment. His deepest pleasure was in its substance and in the inspiration it breathed into his life. Nor was he wholly satisfied with the exquisite and truthful nature pictures of John Burroughs. His mind was essentially vigorous, and of a fiber as firm as it was fine. He enjoyed a contest at the bar, on the hustings, and in this House. He could easily have become a reformer. It is doubtful, however, if one possessing the variety of his intellectual sympathies could have become an agitator, with its narrowness and monotony.

Others have spoken of his gifts of speech, and surprise was sometimes expressed that he did not oftener address this House. In the first years of his service, before attachment to one of the great committees, his voice was frequently heard in debate, but he gradually yielded to the rule governing most Members who work upon important committees, of speaking only when measures are before the House which come from their committees or about which they are especially informed. Such Members do not fill the RECORD. It is easy to criticise an item in a supply bill the purpose of which lies upon the surface and opposition to which requires neither research nor special information. Such debate did not interest Mr. BRICK. He held himself in reserve to aid only when help was needed to enlighten, and then he presented the information and argument learned by hard work in the committee room. He was at once free and measured. He had rare skill in the presentation of facts, and if at times caustic, he was never noisy, nor unfair, nor conceited.

It is needless to say that he was not sectarian. Neither was there any taint in his mind of narrowness or bigotry. He believed in God and in the survival of personality after death. He cared little for later-day psychical research and its spiritistic theories, but he had an abiding faith that the spirits of just men live on, striving to attain the best and not unmindful of those who are soon to follow them. He believed, with the poet, that—

They see the face of God, and know at last
The thing they sought,
But could not find, in this gray light of time;
They tread with holy feet that far-off clime,
They live with God.

And we who follow them are not forgot;
They know our life;
The memory of years once lived upon these lands,
Where we still toil with weary feet and hands,
Is sacred still.

(The Faces of our Dead, by Pascal Harrower. The Outlook, April 18, 1908.)

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, when it is least expected many times the final summons to meet the enemy of life is heard. The person in whose memory we meet presented a case directly in point. A few days before he breathed his last he was apparently in splendid health, but the vital spark went out and left the body cold in death.

He was in middle age—in the prime of life. He had much to encourage him to live, but no allurement of life could withstand the forces which held him in their fatal grasp.

Mr. BRICK had always lived in St. Joseph County, Ind. He came up through its schools in his preparatory work and later attended Cornell and Yale universities, and graduated in law at Ann Arbor, Mich., in 1883. He at once began the practice of law in his home town, South Bend. He was prosecuting attorney of the counties of La Porte and St. Joseph, and had been in Congress about nine years prior to his death. I knew him during his stay in Congress and served on the Committee on Territories with him.

Mr. BRICK was a man of good ability and strict integrity. What he undertook to do he did well. If one will examine the bill to give a delegate in this body to the district of Alaska, which was favorably reported, he will find a strong and forceful presentation of the rights of the Alaskans and in favor of the passage of the bill. It will give something of insight to the caution which swayed him, and the painstaking investigation made about a matter which he nor his constituents had any personal concern. He was partisan in politics, but patriotic always. When the proposition was before Congress for the admission of Indian Territory, Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona to statehood as two States, I remember, in conversation with him as to the merits of the bill, he remarked: "I always follow my party on a matter of policy."

His name indicates a parental appreciation of one of the greatest characters in American history—Abraham Lincoln. With him as their ideal, it is safe to assume that they were loyal, devoted citizens in full accord with the sentiments which dominated the life of him whose name shines forth as a great beacon, preeminently more striking than the average of the heroes and sages of this Republic.

Mr. BRICK was cautious and methodical, honest and truthful. His integrity was never questioned in any particular, so far as I have information. He had some frailties amongst his many virtues, it may be, but if so, let him who has no faults, condemn. His life shines out with the greater luster the more you study it. He was most appreciated by those who know him best. Never offensive, always affable and pleasant, his association tended to good cheer and his counsel to better living. He was devoted to his wife and child. A few days before his departure, he told me how rejoiced he was at his daughter's success in school, and expressed the thought that he was living now for his child and her mother. What higher purpose could prompt a man! What love more sacred—what relation more dear! The wife who gives up all to accept the lot and share the fate of man, and the child which comes into the home to share the joint affection; it becomes the truest bond of union; the strongest incentive for unusual endeavor; and the cause of the exhibition of that which is noblest and best in man. Mr. BRICK lives in the memory of men, but nowhere more constantly than in the lives of the wife and daughter left behind. Man may philosophize about the hereafter and its desirability, but no stronger reason can be given than that the afflicted family circle may be reunited. In times of distress and grief there is no sweeter thought than that separation shall cease and that perpetual reunion shall follow the resurrection morn.

To his colleagues on this floor, for whom he had an abiding friendship and personal interest, his taking was a serious loss. These may each say, "My friend has gone." What monument more enduring than friendship; what examples more enchanting than the exhibition of genuine friendship? David and Jonathan, Damon and Pythias, are noted illustrations of the strength of the cord which binds men in sympathetic and unselfish interest, but thousands of such characters may be found in the world. Mr. BRICK was true to his friends and consecrated to their welfare. I remember well a little incident which exhibits what I believe was his freedom from selfishness. On separating a few years ago I had a slight throat affection, which resulted in constant hoarseness. He said, "If you will permit me, I can send you the medicine which will overcome your trouble," and explained what it was. He said he would send me some of it when he went home. I thanked him, and thought no more about it. In a day or two after I reached Missouri I received the remedy which he believed would relieve. This little incident, like so many in Holy Writ, helps to point out the real elements of genuine character which, carried to the extreme, would cause the man to die for his friend.

No man could have seen the unusual demonstrations of affection in South Bend on the day of his burial—the holiday from business, the unusual large concourse of people who sought to pay their respect to the dead, with the streets lined with people for miles, and the occasional outburst in audible tones, "BRICK was a good fellow," "I loved ABE," "He was one of my best friends;" in fact, the repeated evidence of real affliction and grief on every hand—without realizing that a good man had been called away to that place from whence no man returns.

In the death of Mr. BRICK many lessons are found for the surviving. In the life of Mr. BRICK was much that was worthy of our emulation. Your friend and mine has gone, but is not forgotten. His work for his country was patriotic and helpful. His constituents were the beneficiaries of his best endeavors; his town was a source of pride. Mr. BRICK rejoiced in the loyalty of his friends, but he was best of all within the home, which I believe is the real test of genuine manhood. The family unit is the hope of the Republic, the perpetuity of family ties, the enduring monument which man builds for country, the homage and devotion to the inmates who are there to bless, is the touchstone which separates the genuine from the false, and the love of wife and child is the culmination of the highest and noblest that can assert itself in human life.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to place a few wreaths upon the tomb of a man whom I loved well. While I indorse everything said in regard to his ability as a statesman, so well and ably stated by my colleagues, my mind to-day does not dwell upon that part of his career. I rather prefer to think of our warm personal friendship. When I first came to Congress he had already obtained a considerable influence in this body. I remember the greeting that he gave me and I remember how thoroughly I appreciated it. I came here thoroughly conscious of my limitations, diffident, morbidly sensitive, and it would have taken but little on the part of my colleagues who were here to have made me miserable. I am glad to be able to say without a single exception they gave me a warm and cordial welcome, and undertook to help me in every way possible to become a useful Member of this body, and to none other am I indebted more greatly than to our deceased comrade. Like my distinguished friend from New York I love to think of him as a student and a reader of literature. He drank deeply of the well of English, pure and undefiled; from Spenser to Tennyson he was familiar with the British poets, and was master of their subtlest thoughts and sweetest expressions.

I loved to get within the cloakroom, or at his hotel, or anywhere we could meet, and have him recite and review his favorite poets. Never a Shakespearian scholar myself, I got my best conceptions of the work of the great dramatist by the interpretation placed upon them by Mr. BRICK. And with the renaissance of literature, which came to the American writers with Emerson, and Lowell, and Whittier, and Longfellow, and the great men who have embellished the history of literature of this country, he was also equally familiar. And it was not merely in a general way. He was not omnivorous in his reading; it was not mere academic reading. He would assimilate what he read. He was able to gather up the thoughts of the poets and he was able to give them expression. He was a personal friend of Lew Wallace, George Ade, James Whitcomb Riley, Booth Tarkington, and the other men who have contributed so much to bring a literary distinction to our own great Commonwealth. He knew them, recognized them, and, like every other Indianian, was proud of what they had brought of fame to our State. I remember a curious coincidence that when my friend from New York and myself were returning from Mr. BRICK'S funeral our thoughts naturally turned toward him, having just seen him placed in his coffin, and we talked, not of his work, not of his law practice, not of his duties in this House, but we talked of his books.

It seems so natural, in thinking of Mr. BRICK, to think of the authors that he loved, whose beauties he had selected, whose sweetness he had culled, whose glories he had cultivated. He had the poetical instinct without the poetical faculty. He breathed the very aroma of the highest literature of this land and of all other lands. There is something good about that kind of a man. You never saw a thoroughly bad man who loved the great classics of English literature.

He had his weaknesses, and it seems to be a strange fatality that the minds most finely attuned sometimes the most readily yield to extraneous influences. But he had a delicate mind, had a spiritual soul, and if he was not always able to keep himself keyed up to the highest ideals of which he dreamed and for which he wrought, let us forget it. He loved his books; he loved nature. He was a devoted husband, he was a devoted father, and he was an excellent citizen.

Mr. BRICK was many years my junior. Owing to our warm friendship, owing to our close and constant intimacy and companionship, I believed that some day he would attend my funeral. I never dreamed I would attend his.

But men come and men go, and these things bring to us more closely the awful certainty of death. And in the presence of that great shadow how little our bickerings, how little our disputes, how futile our ambitions are! It comes with still greater force to those of us who have climbed to the summit of life and feel ourselves rapidly going down on the other side. Young men in the prime of life and usefulness have gone from this body since I have been here and some of we old men still remain.

But, after all, a real manly man never lives in vain, no matter where he is placed. The fact that Mr. BRICK was a Member of Congress was a mere incident. He led men because God had made him a natural-born leader of men. He went to the front because his place was at the front. He would have gone to the front in any occupation or any station in life.

Let us forget his imperfections and weaknesses. Let us emulate his virtues and his good qualities, and let us rest in supreme confidence upon that God in which he believed, because, after all, in the face of the mighty leveler there is only one consolation, and that is the trust in the divine and overruling Providence.

I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I can not drift
Beyond His loving care.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, Hon. ABRAHAM L. BRICK was my intimate personal friend for more than twenty years, and I would be remiss in my obligation to that friendship if I did not add a word of tribute to his life and character on this memorial occasion.

Before either of us became a Member of this body we were frequently associated together, and occasionally opposed to each other in the trial of cases in the courts of Indiana. He was an able lawyer, a strong advocate, and his professional career reflected the highest and best ideals in the administration of justice. While he had no sympathy with unfair or dishonest methods in the practice of law, he was a master in marshaling facts, in persuasive and convincing argument, and in the subtle strategy of the forum. He translated his high conception of the ethics of his profession into worthy acts and noble deeds. His temperament was peculiarly artistic, his nature was noble and refined. He was familiar with the world's master works of literature and art; he loved everything that tended to elevate thought and refine feeling. His ripe scholarship, his broad culture, his dignified reserve were not mere embellishments, but were powerful weapons in his moral and intellectual armory in waging conflict in the cause of justice and righteousness.

His manner was always gentle and his heart was kind and tender. Generosity of spirit and sympathy for the unfortunate were conspicuous qualities of his nature. He was modest in pretension, but ample in power of execution. His purpose was to live broadly and deeply, and to dwell in perfect harmony with the laws of nature and of man. His ambition was to make the highest and best use of the talents committed to his keeping, and to contribute to the world more than he received from it.

He entered public life, not for honor or emolument, but because it afforded a broader field for the exercise of his faculties and increased his opportunities to promote the interests of the social body. He was an industrious, conscientious Member of this assembly, doing his work largely in the committee room, where legislation is really initiated and fashioned and where real statesmen wield their greatest influence in making laws. His passion was love of country, and he enjoyed the work of investigating public questions and shaping laws and policies to advance its welfare. His religion was love of mankind, and his creed was embodied in the words of Abou Ben Adhem:

I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow-men.

He died in the prime of a useful life, with the sun of his hopes and aspirations at its zenith. His career was a credit to his State and Nation, his death a distinctive loss to both.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK died at the age of 48 years, in the fullness of his mental powers, mourned by the people of his State and district.

On the day on which his body was carried to the tomb the whole population of the city where he had lived and worked and struggled upward stood along the line of the procession with heads bowed in sorrow.

It was a day in spring, when a trembling heat had begun to shimmer in the sunlight across green fields and a smell of new grass was in the air.

It was one of those days when a man seeing the renaissance of the world about him wishes there might also be a renaissance for mankind.

This yearly renewal of life was mysterious to primitive man, and the mystery and the wonder of it have not ceased to civilized man.

For centuries philosophers have philosophized and scientists have speculated concerning the origin of life, but it has always baffled them.

No life has ever been found to originate itself.

Who, then, sowed life upon this planet and who fitted it for the development of life and the evolution of reason, the crown of life?

It may have come by chance, but it is easier to believe that an orderly universe is the result of an orderly Intelligence than it is to believe that an orderly universe is the result of chance.

To suppose, then, that the Power that set this planet spinning in space as one of many planets in one of many solar systems moving through space subject to law;

To suppose that the Power that sowed life upon this planet and fitted it for the evolution of reason;

To suppose that the Power that created finite reason and therefore must be infinite reason;

To suppose that such a Power, infinitely wise, infinitely reasoning, would create reasoning beings, with thoughts, hopes, and aspirations caught from the Infinite only to make them the sport of circumstance for a little time and then to let them "lie in cold obstruction and to rot" in the grave, is to suppose a Power of infinite cruelty.

Plato taught long ago that the human soul neither begins nor ends.

But whether human life here is a beginning or whether "birth is but a forgetting" of some previous existence, men—groping for knowledge, searching the Book of Life and finding that nothing is lost in nature's infinite mutations—have come to believe, what for centuries was only a hope, that death is only a transition, and that life here is only a phase of continuing existence.

Thousands of years ago Job propounded the question: "If a man die, shall he live again?" and years afterwards Paul, the apostle, made answer: "If Christ be not risen from the dead, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain."

And it came to pass that on a Sunday morning long ago, the third day after the crucifixion, two women on their way to the Savior's tomb were wondering who should "roll away the stone from the door of the sepulcher" for them, but "as they looked they saw that the stone was rolled away." When that stone was rolled away it opened an avenue upward for the hope of all mankind. Therefore—

He who died at Azan sends
This to comfort faithful friends;
* * * what the women lave,
For its last bed in the grave,
Is but a hut which I am quitting,
Is a garment no more fitting.

I had talked these things over with BRICK many times, the last time on a train as we were crossing a vast sweep of arid plain on our way west, and if he could hear me still groping about these problems which he has solved, I fancy he would smile a little.

He had thought much not only concerning this "unending, endless quest" for immortality, but he had read widely and studied deeply in many directions.

He was learned in the law, and in the practice of his profession realized Bacon's idea that every man is "a debtor to his profession; that as from it he derives profit and consequence, so he should endeavor to make amends by being to it a helper and an ornament."

I always liked BRICK because he was modest and genuine and was not always advertising without regard to his ability to fill the bill.

So far as history will take account of us, we are most of us mere items in the census list, notwithstanding the efforts of a certain kind of flamboyant mediocrity to make itself conspicuous by press-agent publicity.

I think hard work inspired by devotion to principle will win in the long run, but it does not get its pay every Saturday night.

And when work is being over its task it not infrequently hears a loud noise and, turning around, discovers that some other kind of genius has won.

There is no pursuit in the world where the talent of the faker get quicker results than in politics, but, on the other hand, there is no place where a sham shrinks to its true value more quickly than in a responsible political position.

BRICK was the kind of man who would not resort to the craft of the political advertiser while alive, and now that he is dead he would not want us to exaggerate his virtues.

The truth is enough. He was a brave, honest, truthful, genuine man.

Mr. GILHAMS. Mr. Speaker, whatever may be life's pathway, each of us must meet the last milestone. Time flies and the world moves on, but meet it we must. The solemnity of this hour is coupled with the thought of those who have met the last milestone, among whom is my friend and colleague, ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK.

Of his early life I am not able to speak, as I never came in contact with the people of the community in which he lived or had opportunity to learn it from him. It had not been my pleasure to know him prior to my service in Congress, but I had known of him through his many friends.

Wherever he had gone in the practice of his profession he was held in high esteem and warm remembrance by all. It was his inborn characteristic and good fortune to at once gain the respect, admiration, and love of all with whom he came in contact. He was always spoken of in the highest terms for his ability and integrity as a lawyer while actively engaged in the practice of his profession in his own and the thirty-fourth judicial circuits of Indiana. Everywhere he received the highest encomiums, and was early recognized among the practitioners of the bar to be an excellent lawyer and an able advocate.

He was genial, kind, and loving; full of warmth for everyone; appreciative of the kindly spirit that was manifested toward him from time to time, with a keen sense of integrity, honor, and justice, and a generous appreciation of his fellow-men. He was earnest, honest, and capable, and sincerely desirous of serving his constituents well; of unusual capacity for preparation and to do well that which he undertook to do. He was always easy of approach and never in the slightest degree exclusive, and held himself at all times on a par with the humblest of his constituents, with whom he met from day to day.

Because of these qualities he early gained recognition. Nature, in its kindness, had endowed him with excellent capabilities, and early age found him climbing the ladder of success.

His tastes were distinctly intellectual. He was an extraordinary student of literature, and he was unusually responsive to the flashlights of the historian and the voice of the poet. His power to analyze the thought of an author and to turn it to his own use was always noticeable in all his work. He was not a seeker of notoriety. He was not sensational, but was always modest and unassuming, and was content with doing his duty each day in a manner which he believed would assist the people. He had a keen sense of humor and ready wit, and was, all in all, a generous, noble fellow.

Simplicity of character remained with him whom we commemorate to-day. He was born of common parents, whose lineage was of the common people, and to the common people he was constantly drawn, and never held a spirit of exaltation above them. To him it was a pleasure to serve, and his constituents, however humble, found an obliging and ready helper.

To know ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK was to feel the warmth of a noble and generous heart and enjoy the pleasure of his personal charm. He was as a brother to those who were fortunate in knowing him—broad in fellowship and deep in love and sympathy for all. Nothing could have proclaimed more surely and emphatically the high regard and affection of his people than did the action of his home city and district in the filial welcome of his mortal remains and the loving affection and tearful burial of all that was earthly of their fellow-townsman and foremost citizen.

In everyone we find characteristics which mark the true and noble impulses. They are the sentinels which proclaim the man to his friends, the community, and, perchance, to all the world. They speak for quality, as nobility, justice, truth, love, and gentleness. These are some of the attributes that were strongly marked in our friend and colleague, ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK, and which endeared him to all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. How often do we find those whom the populace has raised to conspicuous position exhibit qualities that are ignoble, ostentatious, and vainglorious; but it was not so with our colleague and friend, who wore the honors well.

From my observation of him on the floor of the House, I would judge he was not given to much speaking; but when called upon to defend his constituency, or in defense of his position upon questions before the House, he was clear, able, and forceful, speaking with earnestness and feeling.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK was fortunate in the representation of a district composed of a sturdy, rugged, and industrious people, of fine moral integrity and intellectual attainments, out of which has come some of the strongest and ablest men of the State; a district that has always been a great force in the State's affairs, producing some of the ablest men in its history; men who have not followed, but have led in the work of both State and Nation in the fields of legal jurisprudence, agriculture, and manufacture.

To be chosen as the Representative of such a district is indicative of the ability and character of the man. Character is that silent, unseen force always felt and known of all men. It is always preceding us, proclaiming our virtues and our possibilities. It is the silent messenger, standing at the door of opportunity and proclaiming our rights to enter. 'Tis the conqueror of adversity and, although it might be outgeneraled for a day, its power of recuperation is marvelous, and success is attained at last.

It has been well said by a philosopher in years past, that:

Rashly, nor ofttimes truly, doth man pass judgment on his brother;
For he seeth not the springs of the heart, nor heareth the reasons of the mind.
And the world is not wiser than of old, when justice was meted by the sword,
When the spear avenged the wrong, and the lot decided the right,
When the footsteps of blinded innocence were tracked by burning plowshares,
And the still condemning water delivered up the wizard to the stake:
For we wait, like the sage of Salamis, to see what the end will be,
Fixing the right or the wrong by the issues of failure or success.
Judge not of things by their events; neither of character by providence;
And count not a man more evil, because he is more unfortunate:
For the blessings of a better covenant lie not in the sunshine of prosperity.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK has passed over to the other side into the great unknown, but toward which all mankind has looked forward with contemplative eye, hoping that he might catch a vision, and thereby obtain a clearer perception of eternal destiny, and so we will continue to believe and hope that "death did not come to our colleague bearing in his hand the sickle of destruction, but the scepter of immortality." It has been said by the philosopher Tupper:

That we are of earth for a day, but an heir of the universe forever!
For neither the congealing of the grave, nor 'gulphing waters of the firmament,
Nor rust of rest, nor wear, nor waste, nor loss, nor chance, nor change
Shall avail to quench or overwhelm the soul within thee!
Thou art an imperishable leaf on the evergreen bay tree of existence;
A word from wisdom's mouth that can not be unspoken;
A ray of love's own light; a drop in mercy's sea;
A creature marvelous and fearful, begotten by the fiat of omnipotence.
I that speak in weakness and ye that hear in charity
Shall not cease to live and feel, though flesh must see corruption;
For the prison gates of matter shall be broken, and the shackled soul go free
Forever, happy fate, to ripen into perfectness, forever!

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, what a sunshine and what a shadow is life! To-day we are in the midst of activity and usefulness, and to-morrow our faces and our favors are known no more forever. Truly it has been said that man cometh forth, like the flower of the field, only to fall, in the full bloom, before the blighting edge of the sickle of death. Also truly it has been said that man's work doth follow him. And notwithstanding the awful truism that "in the midst of life we are in death," there is great inspiration and hope in the assurance that death does not end all, and that usefulness and devotion to duty, in whatever sphere of life, is the richest legacy that can be left to posterity, and that loyalty to friends and country has its bountiful reward, both here and hereafter.

With a magical name and a wealth of industry, ambition, and love of fellow-men, ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK, to whom we give panegyric here to-day, came into the field of life's activities equipped for leadership in an advantageous way. He was not only blessed by nature and environment with qualification for the larger sphere of usefulness in his community and his country, but he diligently enlarged his possibilities by studious research, until his ability shone in distinguished splendor and he was called, step by step, to the highest councils of his illustrious country.

It was not my pleasure to know him intimately, as many of you, sirs, who served with him here beneath this great dome, the emblem of supreme sovereignty throughout the world, but I did know him to be ambitious to serve his country well, and while he was a stalwart in politics, he was magnanimous to all of opposite faith, and he followed his party leaders only so far as he thought them to be right.

Born of intellectual and sturdy parentage, he was endowed with a desire to get knowledge, and after securing a high-school education he achieved scholastic finish at Cornell, Yale, and Michigan universities, and entered upon a successful career as a lawyer. Soon after he was elected to responsible judicial calling, and later enjoyed the distinguished honor of being elected to Congress and reelected four times. And of his services here and of his devotion to his duty, to his friends, to his country, and to the heroes who stood by the Union in its time of peril, an old soldier, with a crown of snow-white hair over a heart of gold, says:

I care not how great his predecessors were, no Congressman ever did more for his district than ABRAHAM L. BRICK. He knew the wants of his constituents, and none ever worked harder for the poor and afflicted than he. No Congressman ever loved and cared for the old soldier more than he, and no one had a greater reverence for the flag of his country—this not so much for its triumphs of 1776, 1812, and 1846, but for its blood stains for the perpetuity of this Union. His motto was, "If you can not say good of one, say no evil." Hence, he always had some extenuating circumstance for the man who may have gone wrong. His badge of love and humanity's heraldry reclines on thousands of breasts whose hearts have felt. Therefore if, after his life of love, he is but dust, he needs no tears. Then all the eulogies, monuments, and cenotaphs of earth are hollow mockeries. If he lives forever, then he is safe, because on earth he furnished the material for his mansions of charity, for God is just and He knows ABRAHAM L. BRICK.

Of his traits as fellow-citizen, neighbor, and friend a lifelong acquaintance says of him:

To his intimate friends Mr. BRICK always maintained that advancement and high standing in the law was his prime ambition, and that it was against both his better judgment and his real inclination that he yielded to the importunities of his friends and entered upon a political career. His eloquence as a speaker, his interest in public affairs and in the success of his party had, however, brought him into political prominence.

The same vigor, earnestness, and assiduous attention to work that had produced the successful lawyer made Mr. BRICK a useful, popular Congressman. A hard worker, effective speaker, and courteous gentleman, the progress of his service placed him high in the regard of his constituents and influential in the councils of his party.

But death ends all activity. There remains but the memory of a reputation. Of the hollowness of fame and power and wealth none were more aware than ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK. At a social function a few years ago at the Oliver Hotel, in South Bend, Ind., in honor of an old-time friend, Mr. BRICK spoke feelingly of the elusive baubles of fame and riches which so many pursue to their undoing; and in eloquent words portrayed the higher satisfaction of an ambition devoted to noble purposes, along the cool, sequestered vale of a private career. Was it the heart recalling its own earlier cherished dreams? Doubtless so, for his high ideals, his love of nature, and his poetic temperament often made him yearn for relief from public burdens, but his sense of duty to friends and country held him in the public service. He esteemed public duty to be paramount to personal comfort; therefore he died literally "in the harness."

So, after his life of generosity, of manifold good deeds to others, let us remember his virtues as worthy of our emulation, and as the bleak winds of life toss us hither and thither and submerge our ambitions with billows of misfortune and despair let us hope that they may ever hum a requiem to the eternal rest of him whose memory we honor here to-day. My hope and my ambition is to succeed his official career well.

And, as appropriate benediction to his life and an inspiration for us, shall we all join in the humble but uplifting consecration vouchsafed to mankind by life's sanctuary in Max Ehrmann's Kindly Light:

Let me do my work each day, and if the darkened hours of despair overcome me, may I not forget the strength that comforted me in the desolation of other times. May I still remember the bright hours that found me walking over the silent hills of my childhood or dreaming on the margin of the quiet river, when a light glowed within me and I promised my early God to have courage amid the tempests of the changing years. Spare me from bitterness and from the sharp passions of unguarded moments. May I not forget that poverty and riches are of the spirit. Though the world know me not, may my thoughts and actions be such as shall keep me friendly with myself. Lift my eyes from the earth and let me not forget the uses of the stars. Forbid that I should judge others, lest I condemn myself. Let me not follow the clamor of the world, but walk calmly in my path. Give me a few friends who will love me for what I am, and keep ever burning before my vagrant steps the kindly light of hope. And though age and infirmity overtake me and I come not within sight of the castle of my dreams, teach me still to be thankful for life and for time's olden memories that are good and sweet; and may the evening's twilight find me gentle still.

House joint memorial 2, by Storey, memorializing Congress of the United States.

Your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent that

Whereas the Federal Government permitted settlers to enter land on the Minidoka tract, under the representation and inducement that water would be furnished said entrymen under the Government Reclamation Service for purposes of irrigation within two years from date of said entries; and

Whereas a large number of people under such representations filed on said lands and, as required by the homestead law, took up their residence on said land; and

Whereas it was further represented to said entrymen that in case water could not be so furnished that a law would be enacted or rules promulgated by the Interior Department whereby said entrymen would be permitted to leave their said entries for the purpose of securing employment until such time as water would be furnished; and

Whereas water was not furnished to said settlers under said reclamation project within three years from date of their said entries and no law has been enacted permitting said entrymen to leave their said lands for the purpose of procuring profitable employment elsewhere, and no rules promulgated by the Interior Department permitting such absence from their entries, and no law enacted whereby an entryman could sell or mortgage any part of his said entry prior to making final proof and issue of patent; and

Whereas said settlers, while waiting for water and deprived of the means of earning a livelihood for themselves and families, have exhausted the money and property accumulated for the purpose of improving their said entries and making homes on said land, are now being compelled to sell their work horses and farm implements in order to meet the first payment on water for said lands under threat from the General Land Office that if such payments are not made their said entries will be canceled for nonpayment of water charge; and

Whereas our junior Senator, Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH, has enlisted his services in behalf of said settlers and entrymen: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That we most heartily commend the work of the said Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH on behalf of the said settlers, and respectfully urge upon Congress the necessity of enacting some remedial legislation, to the end that the present oppressive conditions may be relieved, that time may be granted for making payments on water beyond the dates now in force, that entrymen may be permitted to take leave of absence from their said entries to enable them to engage in profitable employment so as to meet said water payments, or that said entrymen be permitted to mortgage or sell a part of their said entries for the purpose of procuring money to meet water payments on the remainder of their said entries and improve the same, or the enactment of such other laws or the promulgation of such rules by the General Land Office as afford adequate relief in the premises.

The secretary of state is hereby instructed to forward copies of this memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to our Representative in Congress.

This house joint memorial No. 2 passed the house of representatives on the 2d day of February, 1909.

House memorial 3.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, do most respectfully and earnestly represent that—

Whereas the San Xavier Mission, located in Pima County, Territory of Arizona, about 9 miles from the city of Tucson, is one of the most interesting and architecturally perfect examples of the mission style of construction of the ancient padres in the United States, and a relic worthy of preservation for the education and edification of future generations; and

Whereas said mission building is now in a state of decay and dilapidation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the twenty-fifth legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, That we earnestly and respectfully petition and request the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled to appropriate the sum of $5,000, said sum to be expended in the restoration, rehabilitation, and preservation of the San Xavier Mission building: And be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Territory be, and hereby is, directed and requested to forward to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, and the Hon. MARCUS A. SMITH, our Delegate in Congress, an engrossed copy of this memorial.

SAM F. WEBB,
Speaker of the House.
GEO. W. P. HUNT,
President of the Council.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution of the legislature of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 12) asking the Congress of the United States to refuse to enact the measure now pending relating to United States pension agencies.

Whereas it has come to the notice of the legislature of the State of Wisconsin that a measure is pending before the Congress of the United States which aims at the removal of 17 United States pension agencies from their present locations throughout the country to the city of Washington, D. C.; and

Whereas these pension agencies were established years ago for the convenience and accommodation of then only 232,000 pensioners of the United States; and

Whereas the number of pensioners has since that time increased to nearly 1,000,000 (being 951,687 June 30, 1908), and as this number is likely to further increase owing to legislation affecting widows enacted April 19, 1908; and

Whereas this legislature is informed that all of the pensioners of the United States are vigorously protesting against this proposed centralization, consolidation, and removal to Washington, D. C., of these 17 pension agencies as inimical to their interest and convenience: It is therefore Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully asks the Congress of the United States to refuse to enact such a measure, being fully convinced that the system at present in use, to which all pensioners have now become accustomed, will better subserve the interests of this vast body of pensioners, who, owing to their services to the country as well as to their advanced age, are certainly entitled to consideration of their views and wishes on a measure that so vitally affects them.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the secretary of state to the Senate of the United States and to the House of Representatives of the United States and to each of the Senators and Representatives from this State.

President of the Senate.

Council memorial 1.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, respectfully represent:

That in the year 1885 the legislative assembly of Arizona authorized the issuance of bonds by the county of Yavapai, in said Territory, in aid of the construction of the Prescott and Arizona Central Railroad;

That pursuant to said act said railroad was constructed from Seligman, a point on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, to Prescott, a distance of about 74 miles, and the said county of Yavapai issued bonds for said road to aid in the construction of said road to the amount of $296,000. Thereafter, said railroad was abandoned and the rails taken up and with the rolling stock were removed to the State of California, and there used in construction and operating another railroad;

That during the year 1901, the county of Coconino was created by a division of Yavapai County, and Coconino County thereupon assumed its proper proportion of said bonded indebtedness;

That interest has been paid upon said bonds since the date of their issuance, and that were said bonds to be retired at this time, the aggregate outlay, including interest, will be approximately $500,000;

That in the year 1883 the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona passed an act authorizing the board of supervisors of Pima County to pledge the credit of said county for the purpose of assisting any enterprise of a public nature which might be inaugurated in said county, in a principal sum not to exceed $200,000, and the amount of interest that might become due thereon;

That by an amendment to said act passed by the legislative assembly of said Territory in the year 1885, it was provided that the board of supervisors of said county might, at any time it deemed it expedient so to do, to issue its bonds in denominations of $1,000 each, to fix the rate of interest thereon not to exceed 7 per cent per annum thereon, and providing when and how said interest should be paid, and providing that no such bonds should be issued except upon the result of an election called by said board for that purpose, pursuant to law, upon notice given as required by said amendment. Said bonds to be issued in the name of the county, and made payable to the person or company on whose favor drawn, or to bearer thirty years after their date.

Provision was made in the act of 1883 for the levy of a tax to raise a sinking fund to liquidate the principal of said bonds and the interest accruing thereon, and authorizing said board to issue to any corporation or any company organized for the purpose provided in the act such proportion of the assistance provided in the act as it might deem it expedient to grant;

That pursuant to said legislation, bonds in the sum of $150,000 were issued and delivered by the board of supervisors of Pima County to assist in the construction of a railroad from the city of Tucson, in Pima County, to the city of Globe, in Gila County, Ariz.;

That said road was graded from Tucson toward Globe for about 13 miles, and rails and ties laid for about 5 or 6 miles, and not farther, but was never operated;

That after the railroad company obtained said bonds, construction was stopped, the enterprise abandoned, and the ties and rails taken up;

That on June 30, 1908, the principal and interest of said bonds amounted to the sum of $318,275.29, to which with 3 per cent per annum added, would amount now approximately to the sum of $323,828.43;

That said bonds, and all bonds issued under like circumstances and authority within the Territory of Arizona, were declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be null and void in the case of Lewis v. Pima County;

That thereafter Congress passed an act validating said bonds, and in a subsequent action brought to enforce payment thereof, the Supreme Court of the United States held that said act operated to legalize said bonds, the effect of which decision was to compel the payment thereof, with interest;

Wherefore your memorialists respectfully pray that the pending act of Congress, enabling the Territory of Arizona to form and adopt a Constitution and to be admitted into the Union as a single State, contain an appropriation sufficient to liquidate, retire, and pay off the said bonds, including interest accrued and accuring, to the end that said counties may be wholly reimbursed; or that in lieu of such appropriation, a sufficient grant of the public lands lying within said territory be made for the use and benefit of said counties, sufficient in area and desirability to compensate said counties for the amounts paid and to be paid out by them upon said bonds.

GEO. W. P. HUNT, President.
SAM F. WEBB, Speaker.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a joint memorial of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Council joint memorial 3. By Mr. Prince.

To the Congress of the United States, requesting the passage of House bill introduced by Hon. W. H. ANDREWS, amending the irrigation law generally known as the "Carey Act," so as to extend its operation to the Territories:

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a bill introduced by Hon. W. H. ANDREWS, of New Mexico, amending the irrigation law generally known as the "Carey Act," so as to extend its operation to the Territories; and

Whereas the speedy passage of said bill by the present Congress is very important, for the following reasons:

1. In several sections of New Mexico, and especially in the county of San Juan, those interested in irrigation are convinced that in no way can the reclamation of their arid lands be so successfully accomplished as under the provisions of the law known as the "Carey Act;" but as that law now stands it applies only to States and not to Territories, and the object of the pending bill to amend is to extend its operation to Territories as fully as to States.

2. The Carey Act requires action by the state legislature in order to make it effective. The legislature of New Mexico will close its sessions on March 18, so that the time is short in which to obtain the necessary local legislation between the passage of the pending amendatory act in Congress and the expiration of this session of said legislature: Now, therefore (if the house of representatives concur), be it

Resolved by the legislative assembly of New Mexico, That the Congress of the United States be earnestly requested to pass the House bill introduced by Hon. W. H. ANDREWS to amend the irrigation law, known as the "Carey Act," so as to extend its operation to the Territories at the earliest date possible.

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be sent to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to Hon. W. H. ANDREWS.

CHAS. A. SPIESS,
President of the Council.
WM. F. BROGAN,
Chief Clerk of the Council.
E. A. MIERA,
Speaker House of Representatives.
E. H. SALAZAR,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Approved this 2d day of February, A. D. 1909.

GEORGE CURRY,
Governor of the Territory of New Mexico.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Utah Branch of the American Mining Congress, and a petition of the Chamber of Mines of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to create a bureau of mines and mining, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Iowa Association of Cement Users, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the carrying on of the test in the investigation of concrete and other structural materials, which was referred to the Committee on the Geological Survey.

He also presented memorials of the Typographical Union of Memphis, Tenn.; of Typographical Union No. 4, of Albany, N. In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 11th day of February, A. D. 1909.

[SEAL.]

WM. R. SCHNITGER,
Secretary of State.

House joint resolution 2, relating to Revolutionary war veterans.

In the senate and house of representatives of the State of Wyoming:

Whereas by the acts of May 15, 1828, and of June 7, 1832, granting full pay during life to the surviving officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps who served with credit during the Revolutionary war the Congress of the United States established a precedent for the proper reward of the patriots who offered their lives in defense of the liberties of their country and of the Constitution of the United States; and

Whereas it has been the policy of this country from the beginning to maintain a small Regular Army, and in times of war to rely upon the patriotism of the people to rally as volunteers in defense of the national flag; and

Whereas it is a recognized fact that the civil war—1861 to 1865—forms the most sanguinary chapter in the history of the world, during which struggle the Regular Army was maintained at about 25,000 men, while the Volunteer Army numbered more than 2,500,000 officers and enlisted men; and

Whereas it is also a recognized fact that the Union of these States was preserved and the national authority maintained by the patriotism, fortitude, and valor of the volunteers, to whom this great reunited people, now enjoying the inestimable blessing of a preserved Union, owe a debt of gratitude that can never be paid; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States, during the civil war, made frequent pledges that the services of the Volunteer Army should be fully recognized and rewarded by a grateful country; and

Whereas the act of 1901, retiring Charles A. Bouteile, a volunteer officer of the Union Navy, with the rank and retired pay of a captain of the navy; the acts of 1904, 1906, and 1907, granting increased rank and retired pay to the officers of the Regular Army and Navy, based solely on the ground that they had "served with credit during the civil war;" and the act of 1905, providing for the retirement of two officers of volunteers, namely, Gens. Joseph R. Hawley and P. J. Osterhaus, with the rank and pay of brigadier-generals, were acknowledgments of the obligations incurred by the Congress of the United States while the civil war was in progress; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States a bill entitled "A bill to create in the War and Navy departments, respectively, a roll to be known as the "civil-war officers' annuity honor roll," which bill grants to surviving officers of the Volunteer Army who served with credit during the civil war as officers or enlisted men for a total of two years one-half of the pay of the highest rank held by them during such term of service, and to those who served less than two years and not less than six months like pay in proportion to their periods of service: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Wyoming, That, in our opinion, the surviving officers of the Volunteer Army, Navy, and Marine Corps who served with credit in the great war for the preservation of the Union are entitled to recognition equal to that bestowed upon the officers who served in the Revolutionary war by the acts of 1828 and 1832, and should receive from the National Government honors and emoluments equal to those which have heretofore been bestowed upon any officer who served in time of war in defense of the country.

Resolved further, That we respectfully urge upon the Sixtieth Congress of the United States the passage of the above-named bill, and request the Senators and Representative of the Sixtieth Congress from the State of Wyoming to aid in the prompt enactment into law of the bill above mentioned, that the surviving officers of the Volunteer Army, Navy, and Marine Corps may, upon application, receive the pay and emoluments to which they are justly entitled by reason of their services during the civil war and the precedents heretofore established.

Resolved further, That, in our opinion, as such survivors now constitute but a small remnant of that gallant body of men who led the Union forces to final victory, and their ranks are being rapidly depleted, the Congress of the United States should lose no time in redeeming the obligations to these men made by the Thirty-seventh, Thirty-eighth, and Thirty-ninth Congresses of the United States.

Approved, February 10, 1909.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions adopted at the twelfth annual convention of the American Live Stock Association, held at Los Angeles, Cal., January 26–28, 1909, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT TWELFTH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF AMERICAN NATIONAL LIVE STOCK ASSOCIATION AT LOS ANGELES, CAL., JANUARY 26, 27, AND 28, 1909.

Resolution 1.

OPPOSING ADVANCES IN INTERSTATE RATES, FARES, AND CHARGES, EXCEPT UPON APPROVAL OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

Be it resolved by the American National Live Stock Association, in annual convention assembled in Los Angeles, Cal., January 26, 27, and 28, 1909, That the Congress of the United States be, and the same is hereby, memoralized to enact a law which shall prohibit any railroad company from advancing interstate rates, fares, and charges, except upon approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, after notice thereof to interested parties in such cases as the commission shall deem necessary; and

That all parties having the right under present laws to complain of unlawful rates shall have the right to complain of any proposed advances in rates, whereupon it shall be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend the taking effect of such proposed advances until an opportunity shall be afforded the interested party to be heard; and

That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be authorized to suspend in all cases any changes in the tariffs covering rates, fares, and charges, or rules and regulations respecting the same, pending any investigation which the commission deem necessary to determine whether the same are just and reasonable.

Resolution 2.

RELATIVE TO RAILROADS FURNISHING CARS TO TRANSPORT LIVE STOCK AND OTHER PERISHABLE FREIGHT, AND GIVING PROMPT AND EFFICIENT SERVICE.

Whereas there is pending in Congress the bill known as the "Culberson-Smith car and transportation service bill," declaring it to be the duty of railroads, subject to the act to regulate commerce, to provide sufficient facilities for performing with dispatch their duties as common carriers in furnishing cars and transporting all freight, including live stock, and for properly transporting same; and to exchange loaded and empty cars, and otherwise to provide sufficient facilities, fixing penalties for failure in such duties; and to give to the shipper the right to recover in any court of any State or Territory having jurisdiction his damages and attorney's fees, and in the case of failure to furnish cars for shipping live stock double the damages sustained; and also to empower the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce penalties for violation of the act and to make rules and regulations with respect to the time and manner of giving notice for cars, furnishing cars, exchange and interchange of cars, and to make all needful rules and regulations in the administration of such law, and to compel its observance, and to provide rules applicable to the different classes and kinds of freight and the varying circumstances and conditions of shipment; and

Whereas we believe that the enactment of said bill will remedy the evils resulting from insufficient service in transportation of live stock: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American National Live Stock Association, in convention assembled at Los Angeles, Cal., January 26, 27, and 28, 1909, That we heartily indorse said bill and recommend its passage to our Senators and Congressmen from all of the Western States from which this association draws its membership.

Resolution 3.

REGULATING SPEED LIMIT OF LIVE-STOCK TRAINS.

Resolved by the American National Live Stock Association in annual convention assembled in Los Angeles, Cal., January 26, 27, and 28, 1909, That the Congress of the United States be, and the same is hereby, memorialized to enact a law to provide for a minimum speed limit for the transportation of live stock and other perishable freight of not less than 20 miles per hour, including stops, with such reasonable exceptions as should be made on branch lines or over mountain divisions and under other exceptional conditions; and

That the Interstate Commerce Commission be vested with the power to prescribe a less speed limit on proper showing so as to make it applicable to the various circumstances and conditions of transportation; and

That the law fix appropriate penalties against railroad companies for the enforcement of such speed limit.

Resolution 4.

TRANSPORTATION OF LIVE-STOCK ATTENDANTS AND REFUND OF FARES PAID.

Whereas for many years it has been the custom of western railroads to grant free transportation to parties who go out to receive live stock and who accompany such live stock to market or to the feeding points; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission has declared that, under the interstate-commerce law, the railroads may grant free transportation to parties who go out to receive live stock actually contracted for, or may refund the fare of such parties; and

Whereas railroad companies in many instances refuse to furnish such transportation to live-stock attendants going to receive and accompany such shipments on return to market or other destination: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the American National Live Stock Association in annual convention assembled in Los Angeles, Cal., January 26, 27, and 28, 1909, That we respectfully request such railroad companies, carriers of live stock, as have not already done so, to adopt reasonable rules and regulations with respect to granting of return transportation for the attendants in charge of live-stock shipments, and that, in lieu of return transportation in all cases where persons are traveling en route to point of shipment for the purpose of returning with shipments of live stock, as attendants thereto, they shall be accorded free transportation to the point of shipment; and

That where it may be necessary to protect railroad companies against abuses of this practice, they sell tickets to parties going out to receive live stock, with the understanding that the fares so paid shall be refunded upon the showing that said parties went to point of shipment to receive live stock already arranged for, and accompanied same en route to destination.

Resolution 5.

INDORSING TARIFF ON HIDES, WOOL, AND LIVE STOCK.

Resolved, That we are in favor of adequate and needed protection to all live stock and its products, including hides and wool; that we also approve such modification and adjustment of tariff relations with foreign countries, especially with Europe, as will increase our export trade in live stock, meat, and meat products, by authorizing the Executive to make commercial agreements under maximum and minimum duties, to be fixed by Congress; and that the Executive should have the aid and advice of an expert tariff commission in preparing and negotiating such agreements, on which commission the live-stock interests should have fair representation.

Resolution 6.

URGING INCREASED APPROPRIATION FOR BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Whereas the southern cattle owners are suffering annually great losses resulting from the presence of the fever tick; and

Whereas the work already done has demonstrated beyond any doubt the feasibility of the eradication of the fever tick in large areas where they are now found, and the progress made with funds heretofore appropriated by Congress has been very satisfactory; and

Whereas the known facts regarding the life history of the tick and the methods of its destruction justify the prosecution of the work of eradication on a more comprehensive and extensive scale: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American National Live Stock Association in convention assembled in Los Angeles, Cal., January 26, 27, and 28, 1909, That the appropriation made for this work by the Congress of the United States should be commensurate with the magnitude and the importance of the work to be done, and we therefore respectfully request Congress to make such appropriation as will enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue this important work and to increase this force where necessary.

Resolution 7.

SCABIES IN CATTLE AND SHEEP.

Resolved, That we heartily indorse the efforts of the Bureau of Animal Industry to eradicate scabies among cattle and sheep, and we earnestly urge further and more complete measures to finally remove this harmful and expensive disease, especially in the States and Territories where there are public ranges.

Resolution 8.

TO EMPOWER SANITARY BOARDS TO CONDEMN AND SLAUGHTER DISEASED LIVE STOCK.

Be it resolved by the American National Live Stock Association in annual convention assembled in Los Angeles, Cal., January 26, 27, and 28, 1909, That this association urgently recommends to the legislatures of all Western States and Territories where such laws do not already exist the enactment of legislation that will empower the sanitary boards of said States and Territories to condemn, appraise, and slaughter, and pay compensation for all live stock found to be infected or exposed to infection from fatally contagious diseases, and to make such appropriations as may be necessary to carry on such laws; and

That said legislation should be framed so as to insure cooperation with the Bureau of Animal Industry; and

That the secretary of this association be instructed to present copies of this resolution to the legislative bodies of all States and Territories represented in the membership of this association.

Resolution 9.

APPROVING LEASE OF UNAPPROPRIATED PUBLIC GRAZING LANDS.

Whereas there has been introduced in the United States Senate, by Senator CURTIS, of Kansas, and in the House of Representatives, by Congressman SCOTT, of Kansas, the identical land-leasing bill prepared by your committee on resolutions and submitted to your association at its annual meeting of 1908, where it received the almost unanimous indorsement of this organization, said bill being contained in the annual report for 1908, pages 84 to 90; and

Whereas we believe that said bill providing for the disposition of the unappropriated public lands of the United States is a reasonable, just, and equitable measure, which would do much to improve the stock-raising and agricultural industries of the West: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American National Live Stock Association in convention assembled this 28th day of January, 1909, heartily indorses this bill and reaffirms the resolution passed at our last annual meeting and recommends that this association should vigorously urge upon Congress its early passage.

Resolution 10.

INDORSING FOREST SERVICE.

Whereas under the capable and broad-minded direction of the United States Forestry Service by its chief, Mr. Gifford Pinchot, we believe that the administration of this service is steadily improving and is being conducted along practical and businesslike lines, with a view to obtaining the greatest possible use of the forests consistent with their preservation:

Resolved, That the American National Live Stock Association in convention assembled this 28th day of January, 1909, in Los Angeles, Cal., heartily indorses the forest and water preservation policy of the Federal Government and the management thereof.

Resolution 11.

THANKS TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

Whereas the American National Live Stock Association has received many great and lasting benefits from the administration of President Roosevelt, who has honestly endeavored to upbuild and further the best interests of the live-stock industry; and

Whereas after a service of more than seven years he is about to retire from his position as President of the United States; and

Whereas as President he has given to the live-stock industry of this country that attention to which we believe it is entitled: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the American National Live Stock Association, at its annual convention assembled in Los Angeles, January 26, 27, and 28, 1909, That we tender the thanks of this organization to President Roosevelt for all of his efforts in behalf of the live stock industry represented by this association; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to President Roosevelt to express to him our thanks and as an appreciation of his efforts.

Resolution 12.

VOTE OF APPRECIATION AND THANKS TO HON. JAMES WILSON.

Whereas we recognize that the Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, has served the country faithfully and with great efficiency; and

Whereas the stock raisers and farmers of this country universally revere and honor him for his faithful and impartial services: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American National Live Stock Association, at its annual convention in Los Angeles, Cal., January 26, 27, and 28, 1909, That we recognize the services of Secretary Wilson and the policies which he has pursued in that important office as of lasting benefit to the stock raisers and farmers of the entire country, and that we tender him our sincere thanks; and that a copy of these resolutions be forwarded Secretary Wilson as an evidence of our appreciation.

Resolution 13.

INDORSING BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY.

Resolved, That on behalf of the live stock industry, we express our hearty appreciation of the valuable and efficient work of the Bureau of Plant Industry, especially in its investigations of poisonous plants, and we urge upon Congress the necessity of liberal appropriations for the carrying on and extending of the work of this department.

Joint resolution.

Whereas periodical floods of the Minnesota and the Red River of the North during the past ten years have caused vast damage to property in Minnesota and North and South Dakota; and

Whereas it is the unanimous testimony of engineers familiar with these rivers and their watersheds that it is entirely feasible and practicable to so regulate and control the waters of these streams by a system of impounding reservoirs and by the improvement of the channels thereof, so as to entirely prevent these disastrous floods; and

Whereas the construction of such impounding reservoirs will not only prevent destruction by floods, but will also be a most valuable aid in making national waterways of these streams and in creating vast water power thereon; and

Whereas the state drainage commission of the State of Minnesota is now engaged in making a survey of the Minnesota River for the purpose of collecting data from which plans may be prepared for the proper regulation and control of the waters of the Minnesota River and the Red River of the North: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Minnesota (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to work for the immediate development of the Minnesota and Red River of the North as waterways by the Federal Government.

Resolved further, That a copy of the foregoing resolution, when adopted, be sent by the chief clerk of the house to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress; also a copy to the speakers of the houses of representatives of North and South Dakota, with a request for joint action by the legislatures of those States.

Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting held at Center, N. Dak., February 2, 1909.

The evening being fine and the moon bright helped to draw a large crowd to the court-house on last Tuesday night for the purpose of discussing the recent bills as introduced in Congress on the coal-field proposition. A set of resolutions were drawn and forwarded to our Representatives in Washington.

The meeting was called to order by E. F. Mutchler, who was immediately nominated chairman. The election of a secretary having been made, Mr. Mutchler devoted some time to the reading of the recent bills which have been introduced by McCUMBER, MARSHALL, and GRONNA in their endeavors to get the homestead and coal-land questions settled so that entrymen could obtain patents. A committee consisting of J. W. Bennett, E. A. Larson, J. J. Krauth, Lewis Dresser, and Elmer Vail were appointed by the chair to form suitable resolutions, and the following were presented and after discussion and amendments were adopted:

RESOLUTIONS.

"Whereas there is now pending before the Congress a bill to grant to homesteaders and settlers a clear patent for all lands which were recently set aside for coal purposes in the county of Oliver, State of North Dakota: Now, therefore, we, the citizens of Oliver County, in mass meeting assembled at Center on this 2d day of February, 1909, do adopt the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That we indorse the bill of Senator PORTER J. McCUMBER relating to patents on homestead lands in this State: Be it further

"Resolved, That we indorse the resolutions as passed by the legislature of North Dakota striking out the following words from the last clause, 'and which were not designated as coal lands at the time such entry was made.'"

The above petition and resolutions were signed by nearly all present, and a telegram was forwarded to Senator McCUMBER advising him of the meeting and that the resolutions and signatures would follow by mail.

We give below the resolutions as adopted by the state legislature:

"Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States a bill providing that the United States Government shall reserve unto itself all mining rights to all coal deposits underlying government lands for which patent has not been issued so far and that patent be issued for the surface of the land only; and

"Whereas most of these coal-underlying lands in the western part of North Dakota have been disposed of in former years as land grants and under the different land laws without restrictions of this kind; and

"Whereas the comparatively small acreage of unpatented lands, scattered mostly in small and isolated tracts, left in the hands of the Government in this State are of not much value as mining properties, more so as the quality of the lignite coal in this State is such that it can be used in a limited way and only inside of a short time after its mining; and

"Whereas hundreds of settlers have made homestead entries in good faith and have improved their places, spending thousands of dollars, not knowing that their lands were underlaid with this coal, relying upon and expecting to receive clear title to such lands after fully complying with the requirements of the law; and

"Whereas such clouded title will be a hardship to a great number of settlers because they, with such a cloud and burden upon the lands, will be unable to borrow money on mortgages or sell or dispose of the same: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate of the State of North Dakota (the house of representatives concurring), That our congressional delegation in Congress be requested to use all honorable means to prevent the passage of such bill and to introduce and to assist in its passage such a measure as that the Government issue a clear title to all lands in the State of North Dakota which have been entered upon under our present land laws, and which were not designated as coal lands at the time such entry was made."

Mr. LONG presented a resolution of the legislature of Kansas, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House resolution 24. By John R. Ashcroft.

Whereas under the act of Congress relating to internal revenue it is the practice of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to issue government stamps to wholesale and retail dealers of intoxicating liquors in Kansas, thus authorizing them, so far as the United States Government is concerned, to sell such liquors without regard to their right to do so under the constitution and the laws of the State; and

Whereas such practices on the part of the United States Government seriously interferes with the execution of the laws of this State and encourages violations thereof: Be it

Resolved by the legislature of the said State of Kansas, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and hereby are, requested to use all honorable means to secure the enactment of such legislation as will prohibit the acceptance by the Government of the tax required to be paid by wholesale and retail liquor dealers and the use of internal-revenue stamps to such persons, except in cases where the persons applying to be registered as liquors dealers shall present with the application therefor a certificate from the proper state officer, and under the laws of the State he is authorized to engage in such business: Be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of this body that the Interstate Commerce Commission law should be so amended that no common carrier can transport into any State any article or articles which is prohibited by the constitution of that State or such State.

Mr. LONG presented a resolution of the legislature of Kansas, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 16, relating to the placing on the retired list ex-Union officers of the civil war.

Whereas the Congress of the United States, some forty years after the Revolutionary war, with a desire of expressing, in a measure, their gratitude to the surviving officers who had conducted that long, perilous, but successful war, enacted a law placing the old patriots on the retired list, thereby enabling them to spend a few years freed from the cares and labor of providing the necessities of life; and

Whereas the same course was pursued with the survivors of the war of 1812, thus showing to the world that republics are not ungrateful, but, on the contrary, are ever mindful of the interests of their most humble citizens and regard with the most tender care their aged and decrepit patriots; and

Whereas nearly forty-four years have passed since the surrender of Appomattox, and the number of these veterans of cherished memories is being rapidly reduced: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That we instruct our Senators and earnestly request our Representatives in Congress to give all assistance in their power to the enactment of a law that will place the surviving officers of the war of the rebellion on an equal footing in regard to the retired list as are officers of the Regular Army.

Resolved, That certified copies of these resolutions be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

I hereby certify that the above concurrent resolution originated in the senate and passed that body February 4, 1909.

Mr. LONG presented a resolution of the legislature of Kansas, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 13.

Whereas the pioneers of Kansas withstood the onslaught of the slave power for six years before the war of the rebellion, and when that conflict came on put more soldiers in the Volunteer Army to uphold the Government than there were voters in the State, and then organized all the men left in her boundaries into the militia service to protect as best they could the homes of the absent soldiers; and

Whereas this militia organization did valiant and valuable service, being at various times called upon by the Federal Government to assist in repelling invasion, always responding with alacrity; and

Whereas we believe the survivors of the Kansas Militia from 1861 to 1865 deserve to be recognized by making them eligible to all the pension laws applicable to the volunteer soldiers of the war from 1861 to 1865: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That we most heartily commend Hon. CHARLES CURTIS and Hon. D. R. ANTHONY for introducing in the Senate of the United States and House of Representatives, respectively, bills providing for placing the patriotic survivors of our old militia veterans on the pension rolls, and that we must respectfully and earnestly request our entire delegation in Congress to unite in a strong effort to secure the passage of one of these bills at as early a date as possible, while there yet remain some to be benefited thereby.

Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of these resolutions be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. FULTON. I should be glad to have the Senator from Utah inform us what change has been made in the bill in regard to the requirement of residence, if any, on these lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the conference report now provides that the nonresidence section, known as section 6, shall apply only to the State of Utah. It does not apply to any other State.

Mr. FULTON. Then, in any State other than Utah residence is required as proposed by the Senate bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that that is the case, and also that the only other change is a provision "that no lands shall be subject to entry under the provisions of this act until such lands shall have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as not being, in his opinion, susceptible of successful irrigation at a reasonable cost from any known source of water supply."

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have from the Senator from Utah a statement as to whether the bill in any of its features applies to the State of Idaho.

The House disagreed to certain amendments and it was sent back by the House into conference and came to the Senate the other day. Since then the conferees of the two Houses have met and agreed upon the report as now presented to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report.

CARE OF DEPENDENT CHILDREN IN THE DISTRICT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 721), which was read and, on motion of Mr. HALE, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed:

On January 25–26, 1909, there assembled in this city, on my invitation, a Conference on the Care of Dependent Children. To this Conference there came from nearly every State in the Union men and women actively engaged in the care of dependent children, and they represented all the leading religious bodies.

The subject considered is one of high importance to the well-being of the Nation. The Census Bureau reported in 1904 that there were in orphanages and children's homes about 93,000 dependent children. There are probably 50,000 more (the precise number never having been ascertained) in private homes, either on board or in adopted homes provided by the generosity of foster parents. In addition to these there were 25,000 children in institutions for juvenile delinquents.

Each of these children represents either a potential addition to the productive capacity and the enlightened citizenship of the Nation, or, if allowed to suffer from neglect, a potential addition to the destructive forces of the community. The ranks of criminals and other enemies of society are recruited in an altogether undue proportion from children bereft of the natural homes and left without sufficient care.

The interests of the Nation are involved in the welfare of this army of children no less than in our great material affairs.

Notwithstanding a wide diversity of views and methods represented in the Conference, and notwithstanding the varying legislative enactments and policies of the States from which the members came, the Conference, at the close of its sessions, unanimously adopted a series of declarations expressing the conclusions which they had reached. These constitute a wise, constructive, and progressive programme of child-caring work. If given full effect by the proper agencies, existing methods and practices in almost every community would be profoundly and advantageously modified.

More significant even than the contents of the declarations is the fact that they were adopted without dissenting vote and with every demonstration of hearty approval on the part of all present. They constitute a standard of accepted opinion by which each community should measure the adequacy of its existing methods and to which each community should seek to conform its legislation and its practice.

The keynote of the Conference was expressed in these words: "Home life is the highest and finest product of civilization. Children should not be deprived of it except for urgent and compelling reasons."

Surely poverty alone should not disrupt the home. Parents of good character suffering from temporary misfortune, and above all deserving mothers fairly well able to work but deprived of the support of the normal breadwinner, should be given such aid as may be necessary to enable them to maintain suitable homes for the rearing of their children. The widowed or deserted mother, if a good woman, willing to work and to do her best, should ordinarily be helped in such fashion as will enable her to bring up her children herself in their natural home. Children from unfit homes, and children who have no homes, who must be cared for by charitable agencies, should, so far as practicable, be cared for in families.

I transmit herewith for your information a copy of the conclusions reached by the Conference, of which the following is a brief summary:

1. Home care.—Children of worthy parents or deserving mothers should, as a rule, be kept with their parents at home.

2. Preventive work.—The effort should be made to eradicate causes of dependency, such as disease and accident, and to substitute compensation and insurance for relief.

3. Home finding.—Homeless and neglected children, if normal, should be cared for in families, when practicable.

4. Cottage system.—Institutions should be on the cottage plan with small units, as far as possible.

5. Incorporation.—Agencies caring for dependent children should be incorporated, on approval of a suitable State board.

6. State inspection.—The State should inspect the work of all agencies which care for dependent children.

7. Inspection of educational work.—Educational work of institutions and agencies caring for dependent children should be supervised by State educational authorities.

8. Facts and records.—Complete histories of dependent children and their parents, based upon personal investigation and supervision, should be recorded for guidance of child-caring agencies.

9. Physical care.—Every needy child should receive the best medical and surgical attention, and be instructed in health and hygiene.

10. Cooperation.—Local child-caring agencies should cooperate and establish joint bureaus of information.

11. Undesirable legislation.—Prohibitive legislation against transfer of dependent children between States should be repealed.

12. Permanent organization.—A permanent organization for work along the lines of these resolutions is desirable.

13. Federal Children's Bureau.—Establishment of a Federal Children's Bureau is desirable, and enactment of pending bill is earnestly recommended.

14. Suggest special message to Congress favoring Federal Children's Bureau and other legislation applying above principles to District of Columbia and other Federal territory.

While it is recognized that these conclusions can be given their fullest effect only by the action of the several States or communities concerned, or of their charitable agencies, the Conference requested me, in section 14 of the conclusions, to send to you a message recommending Federal action.

There are pending in both Houses of Congress bills for the establishment of a Children's Bureau, i. e., Senate bill No. 8323 and House bill No. 24148. These provide for a Children's Bureau in the Department of the Interior which "shall investigate and report upon all matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and shall especially investigate the questions of infant mortality, the birth rate, physical degeneracy, orphanage, juvenile delinquency and juvenile courts, desertion and illegitimacy, dangerous occupations, accidents and diseases of children of the working classes, employment, legislation affecting children in the several States and Territories, and such other facts as have a bearing upon the health, efficiency, character, and training of children."

One of the needs felt most acutely by the Conference was that of accurate information concerning these questions relating to childhood. The National Government not only has the unquestioned right of research in such vital matters, but is the only agency which can effectively conduct such general inquiries as are needed for the benefit of all our citizens. In accordance with the unanimous request of the Conference, I therefore most heartily urge your favorable action on these measures.

It is not only discreditable to us as a people that there is now no recognized and authoritative source of information upon these subjects relating to child life, but in the absence of such information as should be supplied by the Federal Government many abuses have gone unchecked; for public sentiment, with its great corrective power, can only be aroused by full knowledge of the facts. In addition to such information as the Census Bureau and other existing agencies of the Federal Government already provide, there remains much to be ascertained through lines of research not now authorized by law; and there should be correlation and dissemination of the knowledge obtained without any duplication of effort or interference with what is already being done. There are few things more vital to the welfare of the Nation than accurate and dependable knowledge of the best methods of dealing with children, especially with those who are in one way or another handicapped by misfortune; and in the absence of such knowledge each community is left to work out its own problem without being able to learn of and profit by the success or failure of other communities along the same lines of endeavor. The bills for the establishment of the Children's Bureau are advocated not only by this Conference, but by a large number of national organizations that are disinterestedly working for the welfare of the children, and also by philanthropic, educational, and religious bodies in all parts of the country.

I further urge that such legislation be enacted as may be necessary in order to bring the laws and practices in regard to the care of dependent children in all Federal territory into harmony with the other conclusions reached by the Conference.

LEGISLATION FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Congress took a step in the direction of the conclusions of this Conference in 1893, when, on the recommendation of the late Amos G. Warner, then Superintendent of Charities for the District of Columbia, the Board of Children's Guardians was created, with authority, among other things, to place children in family homes. That Board has made commendable progress and its work should be strengthened and extended.

I recommend legislation for the District of Columbia in accordance with the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth sections of the conclusions of the conference, as follows:

1. That the approval of the Board of Charities be required for the incorporation of all child-caring agencies, as well as amendments of the charter of any benevolent corporation which includes child-caring work, and that other than duly incorporated agencies be forbidden to engage in the care of needy children. This legislation is needed in order to insure the fitness and responsibility of those who propose to undertake the care of helpless children. Such laws have long been in satisfactory operation in several of the larger States of the Union.

2. That the Board of Charities, through its duly authorized agents, shall inspect the work of all agencies which care for dependent children, whether by institutional or by home-finding methods, and whether supported by public or private funds. The State has always jealously guarded the interests of children whose parents have been able to leave them property by requiring the appointment of a guardian, under bond, accountable directly to the courts, even though there be a competent surviving parent. Surely the interests of the child who is not only an orphan but penniless ought to be no less sacred than those of the more fortunate orphan who inherits property. If the protection of the Government is necessary in the one case it is even more necessary in the other. If we are to require that only incorporated institutions shall be allowed to engage in this responsible work, it is necessary to provide for public inspection, lest the State should become the unconscious partner of those who either from ignorance or inefficiency are unsuited to deal with the problem.

3. That the education of children in orphan asylums and other similar institutions in the District of Columbia be under the supervision of the Board of Education, in order that these children may enjoy educational advantages equal to those of the other children. Normal school life comes next to normal home life in the process of securing the fullest development of the child.

4. That all agencies engaged in child-caring work in the District of Columbia be required by law to adopt adequate methods of investigation and make permanent records relative to children under their care, and to exercise faithful personal supervision over their wards until legally adopted or otherwise clearly beyond the need of further supervision; the forms and methods of such investigation, records, and supervision to be prescribed and enforced by the Board of Charities.

I deem such legislation as is herein recommended not only important for the welfare of the children immediately concerned, but important as setting an example of a high standard of child protection by the National Government to the several States of the Union, which should be able to look to the Nation for leadership in such matters.

I herewith transmit a copy of the full text of the proceedings.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States.

SIR: Having been invited by you to participate in a conference on the care of dependent children, held at Washington, D. C., January 25–26, 1909, and having considered at the sessions of such conference the various phases of the subject as stated in the memorandum accompanying your letter of invitation, and such others as have been brought before us by the executive committee, we desire to express the very great satisfaction felt by each member of this conference in the deep interest you have taken in the well-being of dependent children. The proper care of destitute children has indeed an important bearing upon the welfare of the Nation. We now know so little about them as not even to know their number, but we know that there are in institutions about 93,000, and that many additional thousands are in foster or boarding homes. As a step, therefore, in the conservation of the productive capacity of the people, and the preservation of high standards of citizenship, and also because each of these children is entitled to receive humane treatment, adequate care, and proper education, your action in calling this conference, and your participation in its opening and closing sessions, will have, we believe, a profound effect upon the well-being of many thousands of children, and upon the Nation as a whole.

Concerning the particular objects to which you called attention in the invitation to this conference, and the additional subjects brought before us by the executive committee, our conclusions are as follows:

HOME CARE.

1. Home life is the highest and finest product of civilization. It is the great molding force of mind and of character. Children should not be deprived of it except for urgent and compelling reasons. Children of parents of worthy character, suffering from temporary misfortune, and children of reasonably efficient and deserving mothers who are without the support of the normal breadwinner should, as a rule, be kept with their parents, such aid being given as may be necessary to maintain suitable homes for the rearing of the children. This aid should be given by such methods and from such sources as may be determined by the general relief policy of each community, preferably in the form of private charity, rather than of public relief. Except in unusual circumstances, the home should not be broken up for reasons of poverty, but only for considerations of inefficiency or immorality.

PREVENTIVE WORK.

2. The most important and valuable philanthropic work is not the curative, but the preventive; to check dependency by a thorough study of its causes and by effectively remedying or eradicating them, should be the constant aim of society. Along these lines we urge upon all friends of children the promotion of effective measures, including legislation, to prevent blindness; to check tuberculosis and other diseases in dwellings and work places, and injuries in hazardous occupations; to secure compensation or insurance so as to provide a family income in case of sickness, accident, death, or invalidism of the breadwinner; to promote child-labor reforms, and generally, to improve the conditions surrounding child life. To secure these ends we urge efficient cooperation with all other agencies for social betterment.

HOME FINDING.

3. As to the children who for sufficient reasons must be removed from their own homes, or who have no homes, it is desirable that, if normal in mind and body, and not requiring special training, they should be cared for in families whenever practicable. The carefully selected foster home is for the normal child the best substitute for the natural home. Such homes should be selected by a most careful process of investigation, carried on by skilled agents, through personal investigation, and with due regard to the religious faith of the child. After children are placed in homes, adequate visitation, with careful consideration of the physical, mental, moral, and spiritual training and development of each child, on the part of the responsible home-finding agency, is essential.

It is recognized that for many children foster homes without payment for board are not practicable immediately after the children become dependent, and that for children requiring temporary care only the free home is not available. For the temporary, or more or less permanent, care of such children different methods are in use, notably the plan of placing them in families, paying for their board, and the plan of institutional care. Contact with family life is preferable for these children, as well as for other normal children. It is necessary, however, that a large number of carefully selected boarding homes be found if these children are to be cared for in families. The extent to which such families can be found should be ascertained by careful inquiry and experiment in each locality. Unless and until such homes are found, the use of institutions is necessary.

COTTAGE SYSTEM.

4. So far as it may be found necessary temporarily or permanently to care for certain classes of children in institutions, these institutions should be conducted on the cottage plan, in order that routine and impersonal care may not unduly suppress individuality and initiative. The cottage unit should not be larger than will permit effective personal relations between the adult caretaker or caretakers of each cottage and each child therein. Twenty-five is suggested as a desirable cottage unit, subject to revision in the light of further experience in the management of cottage institutions. The cottage plan is probably somewhat more expensive, both in construction and in maintenance, than the congregate system. It is so, however, only because it secures for the children a larger degree of association with adults, and a nearer approach to the conditions of family life, which are required for the proper molding of childhood. These results more than justify the increased outlay, and are truly economical. Child-caring agencies, whether supported by public or private funds, should by all legitimate means press for adequate financial support. Inferior methods should never be accepted by reason of lack of funds without continuing protest. Cheap care of children is ultimately enormously expensive, and is unworthy of a strong community. Existing congregate institutions should so classify their inmates and segregate them into groups as to secure as many of the benefits of the cottage system as possible, and should look forward to the adoption of the cottage type when new buildings are constructed.

The sending of children of any age or class to almshouses is an unqualified evil, and should be forbidden everywhere by law, with suitable penalty for its violation.

INCORPORATION.

5. To engage in the work of caring for needy children is to assume a most serious responsibility, and should, therefore, be permitted only to those who are definitely organized for the purpose, who are of suitable character, and possess, or have reasonable assurance of securing, the funds needed for their support. The only practicable plan of securing this end is to require the approval, by a State Board of Charities or other body exercising similar powers, of the incorporation of all child-caring agencies, including the approval of any amendments of the charter of a benevolent corporation, if it is to include child-caring work; and by forbidding other than duly incorporated agencies to engage in the care of needy children.

STATE INSPECTION.

6. The proper training of destitute children being essential to the well-being of the State, it is a sound public policy that the State, through its duly authorized representatives, should inspect the work of all agencies which care for dependent children, whether by institutional or by home-finding methods, and whether supported by public or private funds. Such inspection should be made by trained agents, should be thorough, and the results thereof should be reported to the responsible authorities of the institution or agency concerned. The information so secured should be confidential, not to be disclosed except by competent authority.

INSPECTION OF EDUCATIONAL WORK.

7. Destitute children at best labor under many disadvantages and are deprived in greater or less degree of the assistance and guidance which parents afford their own children. It is important, therefore, that such children be given an education which will fit them for self-support and for the duties of citizenship, and the State should provide therefor. In order that this education may be equal to that afforded by the schools attended by the other children of the community, it is desirable that the education of children in orphan asylums and other similar institutions or placed in families should be under the supervision of the educational authorities of the State.

FACTS AND RECORDS.

8. The proper care of a child in the custody of a child-caring agency, as well as the wise decision as to the period of his retention and ultimate disposition to be made of him, involve a knowledge of the character and circumstances of his parents, or surviving parent, and near relatives, both before and at the time the child becomes dependent and subsequently. One unfortunate feature of the child-caring work hitherto is the scanty information available as to the actual careers of children who have been reared under the care of charitable agencies. This applies both to institutions, which too frequently lose sight of the children soon after they leave their doors, and home-finding agencies, which too frequently have failed to exercise supervision adequate to enable them to judge of the real results of their work. It is extremely desirable that, taking all precautions to prevent injury or embarrassment to those who have been the subjects of charitable care, the agencies which have been responsible for the care of children should know to what station in life they attain and what sort of citizens they become. Only in this manner can they form a correct judgment of the results of their efforts.

We believe, therefore, that every child-caring agency should—

(a) Secure full information concerning the character and circumstances of the parents and near relatives of each child in whose behalf application is made, through personal investigation by its own representative, unless adequate information is supplied by some other reliable agency.

(b) Inform itself by personal investigation at least once each year of the circumstances of the parents of children in its charge, unless the parents have been legally deprived of guardianship, and unless this information is supplied by some other responsible agency.

(c) Exercise supervision over children under their care until such children are legally adopted, are returned to their parents, attain their majority, or are clearly beyond the need of further supervision.

(d) Make a permanent record of all information thus secured.

PHYSICAL CARE.

9. The physical condition of children who become the subjects of charitable care has received inadequate consideration. Each child received into the care of such an agency should be carefully examined by a competent physician, especially for the purpose of ascertaining whether such peculiarities, if any, as the child presents may be due to any defect of the sense organs or to other physical defect. Both institutions and placing-out agencies should take every precaution to secure proper medical and surgical care of their children and should see that suitable instruction is given them in matters of health and hygiene.

COOPERATION.

10. Great benefit can be derived from a close cooperation between the various child-caring agencies, institutional and otherwise, in each locality. It is especially desirable that harmonious relations be established in regard to the classes of children to be received by each agency, the relations of such agencies to the parents of children received, and the subsequent oversight of children passing from the custody of child-caring agencies. The establishment of a joint bureau of investigation and information by all the child-caring agencies of each locality is highly commended, in the absence of any other suitable central agency through which they may cooperate.

UNDESIRABLE LEGISLATION.

11. We greatly deprecate the tendency of legislation in some States to place unnecessary obstacles in the way of placing children in family homes in such States by agencies whose headquarters are elsewhere, in view of the fact that we favor the care of destitute children, normal in mind and body, in families, whenever practicable.

We recognize the right of each State to protect itself from vicious, diseased, or defective children from other States by the enactment of reasonable protective legislation; but experience proves that the reception of healthy normal children is not only an act of philanthropy, but also secures a valuable increment to the population of the community and an ultimate increase of its wealth.

The people of the more prosperous and less congested districts owe a debt of hospitality to the older communities from which many of them came.

We earnestly protest, therefore, against such legislation as is prohibitive in form or in effect, and urge that where it exists it be repealed.

PERMANENT ORGANIZATION.

12. The care of dependent children is a subject about which nearly every session of the legislature of every State in the Union concerns itself; it is a work in which state and local authorities in many States are engaged, and in which private agencies are active in every State. Important decisions are being made constantly by associations, institutions, and public authorities affecting questions of policy, the type of buildings to be constructed, the establishment of an adequate system of investigating homes and visiting children placed in homes, and scores of important matters affecting the well-being of needy children. Each of these decisions should be made with full knowledge of the experience of other States and agencies, and of the trend of opinion among those most actively engaged in the care of children, and able to speak from wide experience and careful observation. One effective means of securing this result would be the establishment of a permanent organization to undertake, in this field, work comparable to that carried on by the National Playground Association, the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis, the National Child Labor Committee, and other similar organizations in their respective fields. It is our judgment that the establishment of such a permanent voluntary organization, under auspices which would insure a careful consideration of all points of view, broad-mindedness and tolerance, would be desirable and helpful, if reasonably assured of adequate financial support.

FEDERAL CHILDREN'S BUREAU.

13. A bill is pending in Congress for the establishment of a Federal Children's Bureau to collect and disseminate information affecting the welfare of children. In our judgment the establishment of such a bureau is desirable, and we earnestly recommend the enactment of the pending measure.

SUMMARY.

14. The preceding suggestions may be almost completely summarized in this—that the particular condition and needs of each destitute child should be carefully studied and that he should receive that care and treatment which his individual needs require, and which should be as nearly as possible like the life of the other children of the community.

15. We respectfully recommend that you send to Congress a message urging favorable action upon the bill for a federal children's bureau and the enactment of such legislation as will bring the laws and the public administration of the District of Columbia and other federal territory into harmony with the principles and conclusions herein stated; and we further recommend that you cause to be transmitted to the governor of each State of the Union a copy of the proceedings of this conference for the information of the state board of charities or other body exercising similar powers.

By order of the conference.

Yours, very respectfully,

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BRICK.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to give notice that on Saturday, February 27, I shall ask the Senate to consider resolutions commemorative of the life and character of the Hon. ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRICK, deceased, late a Member of the House of Representatives from Indiana.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I now ask unanimous consent that the consideration of the naval appropriation bill may be proceeded with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 26394, the naval appropriation bill, so called. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 26394) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, beginning on page 1, line 8.

The first amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead of "Pay of the navy," on page 3, after line 5, to insert:

The provisions of the act approved June 29, 1906, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes," providing for the retirement in the next higher grade of officers of the navy who served during the civil war, shall not operate to deprive any officer of the navy who has been, or may be, retired, since the passage of that act, of the right to increased rank and pay to which, but for the passage of said act, he would have been entitled.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 15, to insert:

The accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow, in the settlement of accounts of disbursing officers involved, payments made to officers of the navy while on temporary leaves of absence since March 3, 1899, not involving detachment from duty, and not in excess of leaves of absence allowed by law to officers of the army without reduction in pay.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Pay, miscellaneous," on page 3, after line 24, to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy shall send to Congress at the beginning of its next regular session a complete schedule or list showing the amount in money of all pay under the provisions of this act and for all allowances for each grade of officers in the navy, including retired officers, and for all officers included in this act and for all enlisted men so included.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 5, to insert:

The estimates for the support of the navy shall hereafter show, under the head of "Pay of the navy," the sums allowed for pay of officers belonging to the line, to the several departments of the staff, and to the retired list; the estimates to show under each head the amount allowed for pay proper, for increases due to longevity and foreign service, and for pay at sea rates to officers employed on shore; together with the total number of warrant and petty officers and seamen of the several grades and designations, including as to each class the amount allowed for pay proper and for longevity or service increases. The estimates shall include a list giving the rates of pay for all petty officers and other enlisted men of the navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I rise to make an inquiry. The bill is now being considered, as I understand, in Committee of the Whole?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. These amendments as adopted in Committee of the Whole will all be subject to objection or amendment when we take up the consideration of the bill in the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will inquire whether that will be the parliamentary situation without making any reservation with respect to particular amendments after we go back to the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator would, under the practice, need to reserve such amendments as he wishes considered in the Senate when the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. When is it required to make that reservation?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question when the bill comes into the Senate. The question will then be as to concurrence in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. If any Senator desires action reserved on any specific amendment, he can then, on submission of the question by the Chair, make such reservation as he likes. The Chair will give to the Senate notice of the time for the reservation.

The reading of the bill was resumed on page 4, line 19.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Pay, miscellaneous," on page 7, line 22, after the words "Revised Statutes," to strike out "is" and insert "and so much of section 1556 of the Revised Statutes as relates to pay of clerks to commandants of navy-yards and naval stations, are," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That persons employed in the clerical, drafting and inspection force at navy-yards and stations discharged for lack of work or insufficiency of funds shall for one year thereafter be preferred for employment in such navy-yards and stations in the clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger forces; that section 1545, Revised Statutes, and so much of section 1556 of the Revised Statutes as relates to pay of clerks to commandants of navy-yards and naval stations, are hereby repealed; in all, $868,550.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if the matter contained on page 6, beginning with the words "Provided further," in line 6, and ending with the words "$868,550," in line 2, page 8, is not new matter, and whether it does not change existing law?

Mr. HALE. It is undoubtedly new matter. I do not think that it changes existing law. It is simply making appropriations in certain places and in certain conditions, in bulk, instead of in detail. I will say to the Senator that the same plan is carried through the entire bill as to the different bureaus in the various navy-yards. Heretofore there has been no let or hindrance in these matters, and the sums have been taken from the general appropriation for the increase and extension of the navy, and a large force in that way has grown up at the different navy-yards.

Now, this plan has been taken in hand by the department and by the House, and it is provided that a certain amount—at present there is no limit—in the different yards shall be used as a lump sum, and that at the next Congress the Secretary shall report the amount paid to each person, so that Congress will see how this new plan works. I thought, considering that it had been going on without any kind of authority or scrutiny by Congress, and that they were spending tens of thousands and sometimes hundreds of thousands of dollars without any knowledge on the part of Congress of what portion of the great appropriations were taken for this purpose, that it was a step in the right direction. The Secretary taking hold of it, as I believe in a very intelligent way, was able to show to the House committee just what he would require in amount at each yard, and would report at the next Congress how he had spent it.

I thought it was better that we should know, when we appropriate, say, ten millions for hulls and machinery, ten millions for armament and ordnance, and ten millions for armor, that those appropriations should not be, as they have been for the last few years, cut into, as I have said, without let or hindrance by the department in building up this force, undoubtedly necessary, in the different navy-yards. It seemed to me that this was a step in the right direction.

It is simply a method of appropriation, and is not in contravention of any existing law, for there is no law that forbids their doing just what they are doing now—taking it out of these big sums. There is no law requiring them, unless Congress has beforehand directed them, as we do with respect to next year, to report in detail how the money goes. And so, in answer to the Senator, I should say with a good deal of confidence that while it is new matter, it is not only not new legislation, but not any legislation. It is a method of appropriation. I ask the Senator's attention to that phase of it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I may inquire further before the Senator takes his seat, just for information——

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Has this been heretofore provided for in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill?

Mr. HALE. No. I am glad the Senator has asked the question. That is entirely a distinct matter and applies only to clerks who are here in Washington or in the navy-yards on the regular roll and who are appropriated for in the legislative bill. This does not affect departmental clerks. It affects the immense number—I do not remember how many, but hundreds and hundreds; I do not know but that there are thousands—who are paid mainly a per diem out of these big appropriations, which is not the case with the employees under the legislative bill. It does not cover the departmental clerks.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In paying them out of a lump-sum appropriation, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine whether it would not tend to confuse and obscure investigation, for instance, with respect to where that labor was employed? Supposing——

Mr. HALE. No. I am trying to see how far the Senator's question extends. I should say that instead of that it would rather help, because it would limit the amount, as the Senator will find as we come to the different bureaus. It limits to each bureau the amount of this fund which we appropriate here that can be expended, and at present there is no limitation whatever. I should say that putting these appropriations under limitations at each yard would tend to help anybody who was seeking to investigate what kind of service this is, and how much there is of it, and whether it is the best.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Supposing, for instance, one were pursuing an investigation with respect to the cost of a particular battle ship. Would this new provision be any obstacle to anyone making such an investigation?

Mr. HALE. On the contrary——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Or, on the contrary, would it tend to promote such investigation?

Mr. HALE. The Senator's alternative has struck just what was one of the arguments used for it—that at present it is impossible to tell what the cost of a battle ship is, because the appropriations for the component parts—hull and machinery, armor and armament—are all cut into and reduced, and hundreds of thousands of dollars are being used for these purposes which do not go into the construction of the battle ship. That was one of the reasons urged for it, so that we may know what amount a battle ship really costs. One result of it is that if these appropriations are made on the plan suggested by the Secretary and adopted by the House, it will reduce so much the amounts that are asked for the ships in their different parts of construction. I am glad the Senator asked the question.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine let me ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I see that this proviso reads:

That hereafter the rates of pay of the clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger force at navy-yards and naval stations and other stations and offices under the Navy Department shall be paid from lump appropriations and shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy on a per annum or per diem basis as he may elect; that the number may be increased or decreased at his option and shall be distributed at the various navy-yards and naval stations by the Secretary of the Navy to meet the needs of the naval service.

If I understand the Senator, he says that at the next session of Congress the Secretary of the Navy is to report to Congress the number of employees he has employed in this work and the wages paid them. Does not the Senator think it would have been much better if the Secretary of the Navy had reported at this session of Congress the number of employees he needed in this work and the salaries he expected to pay each, in order that the Naval Committee could set forth the exact sum that would be required, specifying the number of employees and the wages to be paid? Does not the Senator think that would be a much better method than simply to appropriate a lump sum and allow the Secretary of the Navy in his discretion to employ the number of persons he wishes to employ and to fix their salaries?

Mr. HALE. The answer to that is this: I think, and I think Senators, if they reflect will more and more see, that this is a great improvement over the present scheme; but you can not ask the Secretary to report in detail about this system now because he has not tried it; he does not know; he can not tell until he tries it. But at the next session of Congress he will report to us how it has worked. However, he can not do it now.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. This bill, as I understand, destroys the civil establishments at navy-yards. All previous appropriation bills have provided for those persons in the classified service—draftsmen, clerks, and so forth—by specific appropriation of so much for each man——

Mr. HALE. No. Let me——

Mr. TILLMAN. And indicated what clerk was appropriated for.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator that has been a very little part of the service in the navy-yards compared with, I may say, this immense force that has had to be used in connection with the building of ships. The establishment of clerks and the few draftsmen who are provided is very little, either in extent or in amount spent.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand that.

Mr. HALE. So it does not cut much figure.

Mr. TILLMAN. Except that it cuts a considerable figure for those persons interested, and as they are now under the protection of the law, as having been appointed under civil-service rules and have certain rights, to just simply cut their heads off without any provision whatever looking to their protection and transfer in the event they are not needed where they are now, I think is a wrong and a very serious blunder in making up the bill. The provision, like it is, comes to us from the House, it is true, but there is no protection whatever given to these men, and I had hoped that the Senator might see some way, in conference or some other place, to make provision looking to their protection.

Mr. HALE. This can be done. Of course this is a House provision, and it is not subject to the point of order; but an amendment can be put in, following the line suggested by the Senator and also intimated by the Senator from Wisconsin, so as to apply it to all of this force except the regular clerical and draftsmen force now provided for under the legislative appropriation bill. That would throw the whole thing into conference.

I do not think there is any great objection to it, because these employees cut so little figure compared with the great force that we are trying to take care of.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can understand why it may be advisable and in the interest of economy to have the Secretary given a discretion in the matter of employing these mechanics and other workmen by the day; and the only thing that strikes me is that this force, be it ever so small—it is several hundred—ought not to be left dangling in the air, as it were, subject to the whims and, while I would not charge the Secretary of the Navy with any cruelty, subject to his indifference to the rights of these men.

We are always solicitous here, or have appeared to be, to protect the civil service. It is the holy of holies with some people, especially at the other end of the Avenue, and I am surprised that a bill should emanate from that source which does not protect these special clerks.

Mr. HALE. I see no objection, if the Senate thinks it right, for the reasons given, to an amendment inserting after the word "department," in line 9——

Mr. NEWLANDS. On what page?

Mr. HALE. Page 6. I wish the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Wisconsin would see what my amendment is. After the word "department," in line 9, one page 6, insert the words——

Mr. TILLMAN. Where are you going to begin?

Mr. HALE. After the words "Navy Department."

Mr. TILLMAN. On what page?

Mr. HALE. On page 6, line 9, the very clause that was called up by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well.

Mr. HALE. Insert the words—

Excepting the regular clerical and draftsmen force in such navy-yards and stations as is now provided for in the legislative appropriation bill.

That covers what you may call the regular old establishment which they had before they began to build these ships.

Mr. TILLMAN. If we put in an amendment, it will throw the matter into conference, and then we can look at it and protect all those who ought to be protected.

Mr. HALE. Of course it will bring all of that question up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 9, after the words "Navy Department," it is proposed to insert:

Excepting the regular clerical and draftsmen force in such navy-yards and stations as is now provided for in the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. RAYNER. Why not include inspectors?

Mr. TILLMAN. Had we not better say those in the classified service?

Mr. HALE. I would not want to do that, because I think the plan is that these shall be put into the classified service.

Mr. TILLMAN. They are already in the classified service, and I want them to be left there rather than have their heads cut off and leave them subject to the whims of the Navy Department or the Secretary.

Mr. HALE. That is what I am trying to do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will leave it to the Senator's judgment how to do it.

Mr. HALE. Of course it will all go into conference, and we will see whether the House will agree. I should take it as an instruction to the conferees that the Senate desires to protect what I may call this small force which is there now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I understood the reply of the Senator from Maine to the interrogatory of the Senator from South Carolina and the purpose of the amendment which he offered, it was to protect those who are now within the civil service. Am I right about that?

Mr. HALE. Yes; that is, I presume that all these regular clerks and draftsmen in the navy-yards as well as in the department are under the civil service. I do not know about that, but I presume so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest to the Senator from Maine for his consideration, instead of the amendment offered by him, the following, to come in immediately after the words "Navy Department," in line 9:

Excepting as to employees in the classified service and under the protection of the civil-service law.

That would be a little more specific.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to that. It could be changed so as to read:

Excepting the regular force in the Navy Department at such navy-yards and stations as is now under civil-service laws and regulations.

I think that would cover it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think it would cover it.

Mr. HALE. I think my amendment covers it just as much, but I have no objection to changing it. I think that is all right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine modifies his proposed amendment, and as modified it will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 9, after the words "Navy Department," it is proposed to insert:

Excepting the regular force in the Navy Department at such navy-yards and stations as is now under civil-service laws and regulations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I ask the Senator from Maine whether any of the yards are not under the regulation of the civil service?

Mr. HALE. No; I think they are all under the same regulations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And do the civil-service regulations extend to all of them?

Mr. HALE. I understand that they extend to all of them. I have no doubt——

Mr. TILLMAN. Then, the word "such" ought to go out.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The word "such" suggested to my mind that there were some which would be excepted.

Mr. HALE. Yes; let it go out. I did not think of that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine whether the bill provides for employees, draftsmen, clerks, and so forth, other than those now employed under the classified civil service; whether it means in any way an enlargement of the naval force of clerks and draftsmen and employees?

Mr. HALE. Oh, I suppose so; yes. I suppose that this very great force, that is now taken out of the appropriations for battle ships and which by hundreds and thousands is found in the different navy-yards, is not under the civil service now, and this provides for that. The other regular service is under civil-service laws and regulations, but I do not suppose that this is at all. It exists and is being employed, and it is thought, and I think this is very much better than the old plan. We will know, when we make appropriations, not through battle ships, but through regular appropriations here, what this service costs, and it will leave the battle-ship appropriations to be expended in the real construction.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand, then, that heretofore the compensation of these clerks and draftsmen, who have been employed in connection with battle ships, has been a part of the battle-ship appropriation?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. That is the very——

Mr. NEWLANDS. And it is proposed now to segregate them from the battle-ship appropriation and put them under a class of their own as clerks, draftsmen, and so forth.

Mr. HALE. That states in a very few words what is the chief merit of this plan.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Assuming that, the question arises as to whether it would not be desirable to put under the classified civil service these men who are now authorized to be employed by the Secretary of the Navy. As I understand, all our legislation has tended to gradually increase the application of the civil-service law, to bring different classes of occupations under that law, and not to diminish and restrict the operation of the law.

I ask the Senator whether there is any reason why this class of clerks, draftsmen, and so forth, employed in connection with these large appropriations for battle ships, and so forth, should not be put under the classified civil service, just as are the other employees of the Navy Department?

Mr. HALE. There is this reason: They are a temporary force. They are not a part of the regular, old-fashioned naval establishment. They are not paid yearly salaries. They are not in any way a force like that. They are paid per diems; and when the work in one yard falls off the Secretary, under this provision of the House, may either drop them or, if they are wanted in another yard, may send them there. But they have no claim for salary. They are not paid by the year. They are paid only as they are needed, for the time being, dependent on the extent to which we are building ships and repairing ships—largely for repairs of ships.

For that reason I should not think it would be well for us to hamper this experiment; certainly not until it has been tried a year, and we see how it works.

Then there is another reason why I do not think it would be needed. If it is a practicable thing, and even if it is not practicable, the Civil Service Commission will reach out for it, as I think the Senator knows as well as I, and will claim that it should, by executive order, be put under the civil service; and whenever it is in condition that as a matter of good business it can be subjected to the civil-service laws and rules, it will be done by executive order. I have never found any great timidity or reserve on the part of the Civil Service Commission in stretching out its hands and taking into its possession any form of service performed for the Government. So I do not think it would be a good plan to do it now. Let us see how it works for a year, and if it works well, before we get returns I am by no means certain but that some executive order will put in. But whenever we know its extent and range it can be done. However, I do not think we ought to embarrass it now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Has the Senator any information as to the number of men who would come under this provision of the appropriation bill?

Mr. HALE. No; I can not tell.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And as I understand, then, Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I think already some of the, I may say nearer permanent, force of this kind is subjected to an examination. How complete that is, with its range of promotions and its classification by numbers, I do not know. But they are not taken on loosely. There is an examination. But the number I can not tell. It is very great. The Senator can see we have built up an enormous fleet, and when—it is an old story—we build a ship and pay for her she has just only begun to cost money.

She has to go to these navy-yards, and the repairs cost millions of dollars; and the force that is necessary at the yard in the way of plans and designs, not only for building, but for repairs and for practically rebuilding ships, is very great.

I do not know whether we can right here and now get at just exactly what is a perfect form of statute. We can do enough to throw it into conference and perfect it as far as possible there. Even there I do not know that we will get at what we want to do before the next Congress. But the Senator must reflect when he asks the number that the business is immense, that the spending of money is immense. We have gone on raising the annual appropriations for the navy from twelve and fourteen million dollars, which we used to spend when I first began to report appropriation bills, and this year we are spending $137,000,000. Next year it will be $160,000,000. We are not doing that without employing everywhere at every stage of the way an immense and expensive force.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator anticipate that in the future the expenditures will be in that progression?

Mr. HALE. The increase from $120,000,000 or $121,000,000 or $122,000,000, whatever it was last year, to $137,000,000, not reckoning anything for repairs and deficiency, shows——

Mr. BACON. The reason why I used the word "progression" is because I noticed the increase this year over the increase in the preceding year.

Mr. HALE. It will be the same.

Mr. BACON. The Senator thinks, then, that next year the appropriations being $160,000,000, the succeeding year they will probably be $200,000,000.

Mr. HALE. If we go on. Mr. President, that is for Congress to settle. I am sometimes led to ask, When and where are we going to stop? The clerk of the Appropriations Committee said to me the other day, "I have got a new batch of appropriation deficiencies." I asked, "How much?" "Why," he said, "$10,000,000." I said, "$10,000,000 more?" He said, "Yes." I asked, "What is it for?" He said, "All except about a million and a quarter or so for the army and navy." That is not in this bill at all.

Mr. BACON. The point of my inquiry to the Senator is this: I understand that even if we make an appropriation each year for, say, two battle ships, as the navy is increased the expense is not simply the increased expense of the construction of two ships, but in the proportion that it is increased the incidental expenses are increased, and in that way the amount is progressive and the ratio increases. Is not that correct?

Mr. HALE. Of course it does. I have said that repeatedly.

Mr. BACON. I know the Senator has said it, and I got my idea from him, but I wanted him to make the statement now, because I think the matter ought to be well understood.

Mr. HALE. Some day, Mr. President, Congress will be confronted with the absolute, imperative, and unescapable duty and obligation either to borrow money or to increase taxes to pay the appropriations.

Mr. BACON. Is not that day right at hand?

Mr. HALE. It is too near, but it is not in the minds of men. The Senator can hardly get any votes here in this Chamber to reduce this naval programme.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Maine must think that, else he would not say it. He asserts it with such positiveness, I suppose he has made inquiry on that side.

Mr. HALE. I have made inquiry on the other side, too.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to cut some of these expenditures, for one.

Mr. HALE. The curtailing of expenditures is a pretty deep matter. It is more than a matter of sentiment. One man can not do it; one committee can not do it; one set of men can not do it; but some day or other the Secretary of the Treasury will tell us that the money is out and there is nothing left in the Treasury; we have either got to borrow money in time of profound peace or clap on the taxes. That is coming, Mr. President, just as tides and sunrise come. Then we shall have to cut down everything. But one thing that goes on, I have said time and again, and that nothing stops, is the military expense. They will not have a river and harbor bill because there will not be enough money, but they will have an immense army and navy expense. Hundreds of other things are given the go-by to the military.

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator on that point to state here what I have heard stated heretofore. What proportion do the army and navy and pensions and other matters which are incidental to the military service of the country bear to the total expenses of the Government?

Mr. HALE. That was all thrashed out last year.

Mr. BACON. I know it was, and I recollect it, and for that reason I am asking the Senator, as he is now on that point to state it again.

Mr. HALE. The appropriations are larger all the time and revenues are falling off. But I must ask pardon of the Senator. I am conducting the bill; the committee has reported it, and I am trying to get it through. What I have said was elicited by the very searching and pertinent questions put by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Nevada. That is the reason why these expenses are so large.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On one feature of this amendment I have not been able at this distance to quite clearly understand the explanation of the Senator from Maine. As I understand it, this is a departure from the usual legislative policy; that is, I understand the employees named in this provision who are now to have their pay fixed at the discretion of the Secretary have heretofore been paid a sum fixed by law.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wanted to be clear about it.

Mr. HALE. I am glad the Senator has asked that question. They are paid now out of what are lump appropriations, and the pay is fixed not by law, but by the Secretary. Instead of those three lump appropriations for construction, machinery, and armor and armament of ships, there is to be appropriated in this bill distinctly for each navy-yard.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And it is to be separated from the other expenditures which have been heretofore covered by the lump appropriation?

Mr. HALE. Entirely.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So, when the report comes back to the Congress, they will have more specific information with respect to these employees than they have heretofore had?

Mr. HALE. Yes. They will be able to tell us not only how many men they want in each bureau under this adjustable arrangement, but what pay in each case they have given to the men employed under this new plan.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not quite understand the reply of the Senator from Maine to the Senator from Georgia. I did not hear at this distance why the Secretary of the Navy might not have stated at the present time the amount of money needed for the pay of these employees as much in detail as he would be able to do at the end of the year.

Mr. HALE. The Senator sees——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My inquiries are proceeding upon the assumption that in the appropriations made by Congress with respect to government service it is wiser for Congress, which has the direct responsibility with respect to these appropriations, to ascertain what should be appropriated for each specific thing and to fix by law the amount that is to be paid. It was upon the assumption that this provision made a departure from existing law, or at least a departure from the general policy, with respect to appropriations that I first made my inquiries of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. My answer to that is, I think, almost a repetition. I do not think the Secretary now, having just started with this plan, as it is a new matter, can tell in detail how it will work, how much will be wanted, how many man, what pay in each navy-yard or in each bureau. Of course if we do not do anything, if we discard the House provision, they will go on just as they have done heretofore. They will have this force and will have to have it. So I think perhaps it will be asking too much now, at this stage of the bill, to provide that we shall do nothing until the Secretary can tell us exactly what he wants in each yard. I do not think we can do that.

Mr. BACON. I notice that the pending amendment provides for the repeal of section 1545 of the Revised Statutes. That section is very short and is in these words:

SEC. 1545. Salaries shall not be paid to any employees in any of the navy-yards except those who are designated in the estimates. All other persons shall receive a per diem compensation for the time during which they may be actually employed.

I simply desire to inquire of the Senator whether the paragraph which has been under discussion is inconsistent with that section of the Revised Statutes, and for that reason it is necessary to repeal it?

Mr. HALE. It was stated in the hearings in the House when the statute the Senator has just read was cited that it simply prevents a salary from being paid a man unless he is designated in the estimates. That is why the provision was sought to be repealed.

Mr. BACON. The law as it now stands provides that a salary shall be paid only to those who are estimated for.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. And that others shall be paid a per diem. The question I asked of the Senator was whether it is necessary to repeal that section in order to carry out the provisions of the paragraph under discussion.

Mr. HALE. Yes; I should say in the working of it if that statute remains it will embarrass us.

Mr. BACON. As I understand it, the object of that statute now upon the books is to prevent too great a latitude and to limit the regular employment of those who shall be needed in the work to those who are estimated for. This will absolutely take away all that restraint and there is no limitation whatsoever as to what shall constitute the salary of the force, except of course it will have to be done by a lump appropriation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6484) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. In the absence of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I want to ask the consent of the Senate to have 50,000 copies of the President's message on children's conference printed for the information of the country. It is a very interesting compilation and is not very long.

Mr. HALE. That will have to go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ALDRICH. It must go to the committee under the law.

Mr. OWEN. If there is any objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that the resolution is not now in order.

Mr. BACON. I wish to state to the Senator from Maine that of course I am perfectly willing to rely on the judgment of the committee and of the House in regard to this provision, but unless the section of the Revised Statutes is inconsistent with the provisions of the paragraph now under discussion, I do not see why it should be repealed. I have read the paragraph with some degree of care. There is nothing which I find in it which indicates that there is any such inconsistency as would make necessary the repeal of that section.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator read the section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BACON. I have just read it, but I will read it again at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin:

SEC. 1545. Salaries shall not be paid to any employees in any of the navy-yards except those who are designated in the estimates. All other persons shall receive a per diem compensation for the time during which they may be actually employed.

My attention, I will state to the Senator from Maine, was called to it by the fact that the House, which originated the provision of the paragraph which we have been discussing, did not seem to think it necessary to repeal this section of the law, and this is an amendment suggested by the committee.

Mr. HALE. From the department.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Georgia is in error, I think.

Mr. BACON. It is in italics. That is what I judge by.

Mr. TILLMAN. But that is section 1556, which the Senator has not read. The House itself repealed section 1545, which he has read.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. HALE. The provision at the bottom of page 7 is the suggestion of the Senate committee.

Mr. BACON. The one I have just read is in the bill as it came from the House. I was mistaken in saying that it is an amendment of the Senate committee. That does come from the House. The amendment proposed by the Senate committee——

Mr. HALE. At the bottom of page 7.

Mr. BACON (continuing). Is an altogether different matter. I will read that section, and I call attention to it:

SEC. 1556. The commissioned officers and warrant officers on the active list of the Navy of the United States, and the petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, firemen, coal heavers, and employees in the navy, shall be entitled to receive annual pay at the rates herein stated after their respective designations.

Then there is a long enumeration of the rate of pay. All of that is proposed to be repealed.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; the Senator is wrong. It is only that paragraph at the bottom of page 267 of the Revised Statutes which refers to clerks to commandants which is repealed by the amendment of the Senate committee. It does not deal with anything else in section 1556 except commandants' clerks.

Mr. BACON. I was misled, not as to this last paragraph, but as to the fact that the former, which I had read, had been offered by the committee of the Senate; but I see that it came from the House. I still do not see in what way it is inconsistent. Still, if the committee, after examination, thinks it is, I will not pursue the matter further at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 9, after the words "Navy Department," insert:

Excepting the regular force in the Navy Department at navy-yards and stations which is now under civil-service regulation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Maine to look at the proviso near the bottom of page 7, beginning in line 16. We have just put in an amendment on page 6, line 9, after the words "Navy Department," looking to clarifying the situation and protecting those who are in the classified service. If the Senator will look at the proviso beginning with line 16, he will see it provides:

That persons employed in the clerical, drafting, and inspection force at navy-yards and stations discharged for lack of work or insufficiency of funds shall for one year thereafter be preferred for employment in such navy-yards and stations in the clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger forces.

The House of Representatives evidently had in its mind the protection to that degree—that is, for twelve months—of the rights of persons in the classified service. I submit to his experience and wisdom whether we had not better amend that so as to bring the whole subject of protection of the classified service before the conferees. If it is not necessary, of course, we can let it alone.

Mr. HALE. This amendment was moved on the floor of the House and assented to by the Representative in charge. It shows on its face that it intends to apply to this force so far as it can the spirit of what is a part of the operation of the regular civil service of the Government—the feature of preferences for a year. As I look into this matter and read the reports of what the department says about it, I am inclined to think that we do not need to trouble ourselves any further about this force being under the civil service, for I think that it is now substantially under the civil service.

Mr. TILLMAN. But I am only trying not to have the amendment which we put in nullified or have the two cut each other's throats. I suggest to the Senator that it might be wisdom on our part to strike out this provision of the House and then it, along with the amendment which we inserted on page 6, line 9, would go to conference together, and we could consider the whole matter of civil service and its relationship to the Navy Department and what we ought to do to protect those who are under the classified service.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to that, Mr. President. I move that the proviso beginning on line 16 and ending with the word "forces," in line 21, be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. HALE. I do not think it is necessary, but it does no harm.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, beginning in line 16, strike out the following:

That persons employed in the clerical, drafting, and inspection force at navy-yards and stations discharged for lack of work or insufficiency of funds shall for one year thereafter be preferred for employment in such navy-yards and stations in the clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger forces.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I see no objection to that proviso. The employees named in the proviso are within the civil service, but if they should not happen to be within the civil service it would cut them off from the benefit which this confers upon them.

Mr. HALE. Then we could restore them, of course.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That will all come up in conference?

Mr. HALE. It will all come up in conference.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment reported by the committee, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 22, after the words "Revised Statutes," strike out the word "is" and insert:

And so much of section 1556 of the Revised Statutes as relates to pay of clerks to commandants of navy-yards and naval stations, are.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Bureau of Navigation," on page 9, line 13, after the word "courts-martial," to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to furnish naval prisoners upon discharge suitable civilian clothing in case, and only where, said discharged prisoners would otherwise be unprovided with suitable clothing to meet their immediate needs.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine just what is the purpose of that committee amendment?

Mr. HALE. Well, I do not know that there is anything that I can say which would add to the provision. It is a provision in the interest of those prisoners. I will say that perhaps the underlying reason for all of this helpful legislation to naval prisoners is that such prisoners generally are not imprisoned for any very heinous offense. It is usually for some technical offense—some technical desertion it may be. The imprisonment is not long and it is found when the prisoners are discharged and turned out that they are in pretty bad case. The Senate committee thought it well in case where the discharged prisoner has no suitable, decent clothing, to give him clothing, so that he would not be practically naked.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, not knowing fully just what was the purpose of the committee, the inquiry raised in my mind with respect to that paragraph was this: I suppose the prisoners wear a certain prison uniform, do they not?

Mr. HALE. I do not know enough about the regulations of prisons to enable me to state whether the provisions relating to clothing and wearing prison uniform which apply to regular convicts apply to the men who are put into these prisons for slight offenses because we have not got enough of our own. I do not know that they are obliged to assume prison garb. I am rather inclined to think they are not; but still when they are released they are very apt to be found without suitable clothing. They do not want to be sent out, of course, without something suitable. That is what the committee had in mind.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I apprehended that the purpose of that amendment was to provide discharged prisoners with civilian clothing, and I could see no reason, if that was the purpose, for the sort of discretion that seemed to be attached to or a part of the amendment. I could see no reason why these prisoners should not in all cases be provided with civilian clothing.

Mr. HALE. Suppose it happened that the prisoner—the nominal prisoner—had only been in prison a short time and had good comfortable clothing of his own. The idea of the committee was that you have got to leave that discretion to the department.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It had occurred to me—of course, I have had to speculate a good deal with respect to the provisions of this bill in the short time that I have had to examine it; I have not been able to get full information—but it occurred to me that when these prisoners, these employees of the navy, went into prison, as a rule, they would only have their uniforms; and in order that the discharged prisoners should not go out of prison wearing convict garb, the purpose of this amendment was to clothe them in civilian dress. But, if that were the purpose of it, then it seemed to me that civilian dress should be provided without any qualification whatever.

Mr. HALE. I suppose in a good many cases these men are deserters, and they are found not in the service; they are away from it and are not in their uniforms. Most of them have separated themselves from the service.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That would be true as to deserters.

Mr. HALE. They are not usually, the Senator will see, in their uniforms.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 10, line 1, after the word "seaman," to strike out "unless a certificate of birth or a verified written statement by the parents, or either of them, or in case of their death a verified written statement by the legal guardian, be first furnished to the recruiting officer, showing applicant to be of age required by naval regulations, which shall be presented with the application for enlistment," and insert "unless a certificate of birth or written evidence, other than his own statement or statement of another based thereon, satisfactory to the recruiting officer, showing the applicant to be of age required by naval regulations, shall be presented with the application for enlistment," so as to make the clause read:

Recruiting: Expenses of recruiting for the naval service; rent of rendezvous and expenses of maintaining the same; advertising for and obtaining men and apprentice seamen; actual and necessary expenses in lieu of mileage to officers on duty with traveling recruiting parties, $130,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended in recruiting seamen, ordinary seaman, or apprentice seaman, unless a certificate of birth or written evidence, other than his own statement or statement of another based thereon, satisfactory to the recruiting officer, showing the applicant to be of age required by naval regulations, shall be presented with the application for enlistment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 6, to reduce the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Naval War College, Rhode Island, from $19,100 to $14,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 5, to strike out the subhead "Bureau of Ordnance."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 11, to insert:

The President is hereby authorized to appoint, by selection and promotion, a vice-admiral on the retired list of the navy.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I make the point of order against that amendment. Does the Senator from Maine desire me to argue the point of order? The amendment seems to be very clearly subject to it, providing, as it does, for the creation of an entirely new office in an appropriation bill. I am prepared to argue the point if the Senator so desires.

Mr. HALE. I am very sorry the Senator has felt constrained to make the point of order, but it is, of course, good. The amendment provides for the creation of a new office on an appropriation bill, and undoubtedly, if the Senator insists upon his point of order, the amendment is subject to the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the ground of the point of order?

Mr. RAYNER. That it is general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment contravenes the provision of subdivision 3 of Rule XVI, and he therefore sustains the point of order.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 16, after line 13, to insert the subhead "Bureau of Ordnance."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Ordnance," in the item for "ordnance and ordnance stores," on page 17, line 7, after the word "dollars," to insert "and 99 cents," so as to read:

Ordnance and ordnance stores: For procuring, producing, preserving, and handling ordnance material; for the armament of ships; for fuel, material, and labor to be used in the general work of the Ordnance Department; for furniture at naval magazines, torpedo stations, and proving ground; for maintenance of the proving ground and maintenance and enlargement of powder factory, and for target practice, and for pay of chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy-yards, naval stations, and naval magazines: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, watchmen, and messenger service in navy-yards, naval stations, and naval magazines for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, shall not exceed $398,890.28." In all, $5,528,171.99.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued, and the Secretary read to the end of line 23, page 17, as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of shells or projectiles except for shells or projectiles purchased in accordance with the terms and conditions of proposals submitted by the Secretary of the Navy to all of the manufacturers of shells and projectiles and upon bids received in accordance with the terms and requirements of such proposals: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for powder other than small-arms powder at a price in excess of 64 cents a pound. All shells and projectiles shall conform to the standard prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, That no part of this appropriation for powder shall be paid to any trust or combination in restraint of trade nor to any corporation having a monopoly of the manufacture and supply of gunpowder in the United States, except in the event of an emergency.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator who is at the present moment in charge of this bill with respect to the last proviso. It provides:

That no part of this appropriation for powder shall be paid to any trust or combination in restraint of trade nor to any corporation having a monopoly of the manufacture and supply of gunpowder in the United States, except in the event of an emergency.

What appropriation is meant by the words "this appropriation?" Is that reference confined to the $5,528,171.99 mentioned in lines 6, 7, and 8, on page 17, or does it also refer to the $650,000 mentioned in lines 24 and 25 on the same page, and does it also include ammunition for ships as provided for beginning in line 9, on page 19? I ask only for information, because it is a most interesting point.

I observed the other day in the newspapers that the House of Representatives had provided that the powder to be bought by the United States was not to be bought of any trust or combination in restraint of trade, save in an emergency, but I find this limitation, as I construe the bill, confined to the powder that is to be purchased under the appropriations embracing in all $5,528,171.99. If I am in error with regard to that construction of the bill, I should be glad to have it pointed out by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I take it for granted that the appropriation of $5,528,171.99 applies to various other kinds of material than powder. Powder is included in the item. The House, in considering this bill, on page 68 inserted, in lines 20 and 21, the words "maintenance and enlargement of," referring to the powder factory, and then added $250,000 additional to the powder item.

Mr. CUMMINS. But my question is, Would the Government of the United States be permitted to buy the smokeless powder mentioned in lines 24 and 25 on page 17 to the extent of $650,000 of a trust or of a combination, and would the United States be permitted to buy the ammunition for ships, which, I assume, includes powder, to the extent provided on page 19 following the description "ammunition for ships?"

Mr. GALLINGER. My impression would be, Mr. President, in the matter of smokeless powder, that if it were manufactured by a trust or combination in restraint of trade the proviso would apply to that as well as to ordinary powder; but I think that that is not true so far as smokeless powder is concerned. The Government itself is manufacturing smokeless powder. Nor do I think it would apply to the item for the ammunition on ships. It certainly would not unless the Government was compelled, as it were, to deal with a trust or a combination. If that powder were all manufactured by a trust or combination in restraint of trade, I should say the proviso would apply to powder for whatever purpose it was purchased. That would be my judgment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am expressing no opinion with regard to the propriety of forbidding the United States buying powder from a trust or a combination. I express no opinion upon that point; but it seems to me that, as necessarily construed, the inhibition would be limited to the purchases of powder made, together with all other ordnance stores, for which $5,528,171.99 are appropriated. I have been informed that substantially no powder is bought under that appropriation according to the practice and the custom of the navy. If that information be true, then the prohibition attached by the House of Representatives, it seems to me, is keeping the promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope.

I want the people to know to just what extent it is proposed to limit the United States in buying powder of a trust or combination, for, as I construe this bill with respect to all purchases of powder, save a very limited amount, the limitation does not apply at all. We shall be in precisely the same position practically after the passage of this bill with this prohibition in it as we were before. In order to show that this conclusion is well founded, may I ask the Senator from New Hampshire what kind of powder is bought under what might be called the "ordnance appropriation," and to what extent is powder bought under that part of the authority?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will not undertake to answer that with definiteness, but my impression is that it would apply to ordinary black powder and likewise to smokeless powder. The Government purchases both kinds of powder and uses both.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may or may not be well informed, because I recognize that I am inexperienced here, but I am informed that under the provision of the bill to which I have referred the department buys only black powder for loading shells and the like, and that the proportion so bought, compared with all the powder used by the Department of the Navy, is so small as to be almost negligible. If that be true, we have, then, a bill which has been heralded to the world as a bill prohibiting the United States from buying powder from combinations in restraint of trade, when in fact it contains no substantial limitation whatsoever.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, if the committee intended that provision to mean as stated, they could obviate any question or possibility of doubt as to what it means by a few words of amendment, by striking out, in line 19, page 17, the word "this" and inserting the word "any," and adding the words "appropriation made in this act for the purchase of powder," so as to read:

Provided, That no part of any appropriation made in this act for the purchase of powder shall be paid to any trust or combination in restraint of trade.

That would remove any question as to its construction.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, so far as the provision on page 19 is concerned, I replied to that without giving it much consideration. The Senator from Iowa will observe that the $5,528,171.99 is not an item for powder alone. It covers——

Mr. CUMMINS. I remarked a few moments ago that I understand that, and I understand the amount of powder ordinarily purchased under that appropriation is so small that it might be disregarded entirely in considering the question I suggested.

Mr. GALLINGER. Inasmuch as the House on the floor added $250,000 to the appropriation to cover the powder provision, it, of course, is of some consequence; but undoubtedly it is a small part of all the powder purchased for the navy. There is no doubt about that. The Senator is right on that point.

Mr. CUMMINS. My inquiry was made in order to provide myself with some information with regard to the condition of the Government in respect of its ability to furnish powder to the navy.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, he will observe that in the proviso at the bottom of page 17 the House very properly limited the price for which powder should be purchased.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. It made a limitation, so far as the cost price is concerned.

Mr. CUMMINS. I observed that, but the inquiry I have made I intended as preliminary to a further one. I think it would be interesting to the Members of the Senate, at least those who are as inexperienced as I am, if some member of the Naval Committee at some point in the consideration of the bill would inform the Senate with regard to the capacity of the government factory for the production of powder, so that we may judge intelligently whether it is wise or unwise to attach to any part of the bill the prohibition I have read.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that my recollection is, and I think it is correct, that the Government is now producing about 1,200,000 pounds of powder per year.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. STONE. Pertinent to this discussion I wish to make a statement of what I understand to be the fact and then to ask the opinion of the Senator from New Hampshire, now in charge of the bill, as to the possible effect of the proviso contained between lines 18 and 23.

I understand that the government plant at Indianhead produces about one-third of the powder now consumed by the navy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. To be definite, I will say to the Senator that the Government produced 1,877,000 pounds, and we bought 2,408,000 pounds last year.

Mr. STONE. A little less than one-third.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; a little less than one-third.

Mr. STONE. The remaining two-thirds of the powder is purchased from what is popularly known as the "powder trust." I have seen it stated in the debates in another place and in some official documents read there that the powder purchased, exceeding 2,000,000 pounds, was all bought of what is known as the "Du Pont Powder Company," or its allied interests, and that there was no other corporation or producer from whom powder of the kind needed could be secured. In other words, what is known as the "powder trust" is the sole source of our supply.

Mr. GALLINGER. Outside of what we ourselves manufacture.

Mr. STONE. Outside of what the Government itself manufactures. Now, if that be true, it occurs to me—and upon that I ask the deliberate and better judgment of the Senator—whether or not that proviso is not practically without force and effect; whether there is any real meaning to it. It is true the last clause in the proviso says:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation for powder shall be paid to any trust or combination in restraint of trade, nor to any corporation having a monopoly of the manufacture and supply of gunpowder in the United States, except in the event of an emergency.

But an emergency or a necessity, it seems to me, arises the moment the appropriation is made to purchase powder needed by the Government; and since there is no other source from which it can be secured, except what is known as the "trust," we must procure it there or go without it. Therefore it seems to me that the clause is a mere pretense. It is a declaration sent out to the country that we will not buy from a trust, so called, when we know we will have to buy from the trust. It ought not to be in the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. The language was inserted by the other House. I will say to the Senator that I imagine the emergency alluded to would be a military emergency. But it does not say that exactly, and perhaps the Senator's criticism has considerable ground of justification.

Mr. STONE. If my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, means by "military necessity" that a war is threatened or in actual existence, then only one-third of the amount of the powder needed for the ordinary uses of the navy would be supplied by the Government's own manufactory. What would we do for the remainder?

Mr. GALLINGER. This exception allows the Government then to purchase from any source available.

Mr. STONE. But you can not buy it except from the one source.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right; and the exception is made——

Mr. STONE. The emergency then exists?

Mr. GALLINGER. The exception is made in that emergency. I will say to the Senator, that the "joint board," so called, has been in the habit of investigating the powder question and fixing a price.

Mr. STONE. As the Senator suggests to me, this is for peace, not for war.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, of course; we are all for peace.

Mr. STONE. But the bill makes provision for time of peace and not for time of war.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; that is very true.

I was about to remark that the joint board has been in the habit of fixing the price of powder. Last year it fixed it at 67 to 69 cents a pound. This bill, I think very properly, reduces that amount to 64 cents a pound, making a very material reduction in the price the Government is allowed to pay for the powder.

Mr. President, I am not going to say whether the language here inserted by the House is wise, where it is provided that the Government may purchase the powder in an emergency from a trust or combination. But the Senate is not responsible for that language. Of course it can be stricken out if it is thought desirable to do so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Who is to determine whether or not an emergency exists?

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume the department or the President.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Navy Department or the President would determine it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Presumably the department.

Mr. TILLMAN. Therefore this means that if in the judgment of the President the powder trust should have some of the Government's patronage, that some powder should be bought from it, an emergency would be discovered to permit it to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should hardly think that that would follow. I have more faith in human nature than the Senator has, and more faith in our high officials of Government.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not expressing any opinion as to the integrity of purpose or the character of high officials, because we do not know whom they are going to be other than the President himself. We hear all sorts of rumors about this and that and the other Cabinet officer, but so far, I believe, other than our colleague, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who has had the Constitution ravished in his behalf in order to be eligible, we do not know exactly who will be the heads of departments next year.

Mr. GALLINGER. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. It seems to me, however, that we might safeguard this matter much better by enlarging the appropriations for the government powder factory and make all our powder, in view of the fact that we are informed by the officials that we can make the powder at 43 cents a pound; and why the department should be allowed to buy it at 64 cents when we can make it at 43 I can not understand, unless there is some nigger in the wood pile somewhere. Let us ask the Senate to vote for an increase of the powder factory to a size sufficient to give us all the powder we need.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that the $250,000 added to this bill in the House on the floor was for the very purpose of increasing the capacity of the plant.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will it increase it to a sufficient degree, so that we will never, in an emergency, have to apply to the powder trust?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would not want to say that it would.

Mr. STONE. Moreover, if the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me a word, I have seen it stated in the RECORD, and in some hearings in the House, that while the $250,000 appropriated was to enlarge our plant at Indianhead, it really was not intended for present use, but simply to establish and build and enlarge it to meet a possible emergency in time of war.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I were able to understand the discussion that took place elsewhere when this same matter was under consideration, the increase of $250,000 in the appropriation, referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire, would only increase the capacity of the government manufactory to about 2,000,000 pounds per year, which would be only about two-thirds or one-half the total amount used by the Government. Am I right about this?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is right about it. Of course, we are moving along and developing this industry year by year. I suppose it was not thought desirable to make appropriations sufficiently large to manufacture all the powder at once. Of course we can not make any of this powder until we get the buildings and the facilities for manufacturing. I do not know how long that will be, but it was thought desirable to make an additional appropriation whereby we could practically double our present manufacturing capacity. Of course it might be wise to make a still larger appropriation. I am not going to express an opinion on that point.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course it will take a much longer period of time for the Government to turn out the powder than is required if we progress so very slowly in the development of our plant. From the little investigation which it has been possible for me to make I have gathered that the Government produces powder at a cost of 51 cents a pound.

Mr. TILLMAN. My information is 43 cents a pound.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from South Carolina, being a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and probably having access to inside information which we unfortunate——

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, the Senator need not put himself in that category. He can go to the document room and get anything that "the Senator from South Carolina" or any other member of the Naval Affairs Committee can get.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course that is possible; but as legislation proceeds here largely by committees, the means of investigation open to individual Members of the Senate who are assigned to other committees are not, after all, so ready, so accessible, so complete as to those who have the subject directly in hand.

Now, I may be entirely wrong about the amount that it costs the Government to make powder. The suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina only emphasizes the point I was about to make. If it costs only 47 cents a pound to make it instead of 51——

Mr. TILLMAN. Forty-three.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from South Carolina says 43 cents. The difference between the amount which the Government pays for powder and the cost at which the Government produces it is greater than I had supposed it to be. This furnishes a stronger reason for the Government to take the hazard of making an additional investment, so as to enlarge the plant and increase the output of the Government Powder Factory.

Mr. TILLMAN. I agree entirely with what the Senator says, but does not the Senator recall that a certain distinguished man had to resign as treasurer of the Republican campaign committee because he was supposed to belong to the powder trust?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; and I recall a good many other resignations that took place from campaign committees. They were not confined to any one party.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know that. I simply say that if you will undertake to skin your cat, I will undertake to skin ours, if we have any.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can help to skin this cat, and all I want is the cooperation of the Senator from South Carolina and that of other Senators in skinning down and scaling down the propositions in this bill before we get through with the consideration of it; and I hope the Senator from South Carolina will give his very valuable assistance, as we get along in the consideration of this bill, to other provisions, and I believe he will.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not give us sheet lightning, but will give us a concrete proposition to vote on; that he will offer an amendment increasing the amount for the construction of a powder factory adequate for the uses and needs of the Government, and I shall be very glad to give it my individual vote. I do not know what the Senate will do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course there is no restriction upon any Senator with respect to amendments. I rose to propose an increase in the amount provided in the bill for this proposition. I have not the information to guide me in determining what the amount should be, that any member of the Committee on Naval Affairs must have, whether he be in the majority or in the minority. With my meager information on the subject, and it is very meager, I am feeling my way along as best I can.

I do not know whether the appropriation of $250,000 should be enlarged by one hundred thousand more, in order that the Government may make all of its powder. If some member of the Committee on Naval Affairs will kindly inform me as to how much is necessary to enable this Government to make all of its powder, I will gladly take the responsibility, whatever it is, of offering an amendment to provide that amount.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. HALE. I have been away from the Chamber for the last ten minutes, and I do not know what is the parliamentary condition. Mr. President, is there any amendment pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If it will help the Senator from Maine to catch up, I will say we are on page 17 of the bill, and are considering some of the provisions with respect to the manufacture of powder and its cost when that powder is manufactured by the Government and when purchased from other manufacturers.

Mr. HALE. Now, will it interfere with the Senator if I state the attitude on this matter?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; it will be very helpful.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the history of this matter is very plain to anybody who has read the debates in the other House. There was clearly there a feeling that there ought to be some legislation to protect the Government and reduce the price of powder used by the Government and have a safeguard for the future, so that no monopoly could dictate to the Government. It went along in stages. The first proposition was that the extreme price to be paid by the Government should be fixed. The answer to that was that a board had heretofore fixed the price and that it was deemed by the department reasonable. But the House evidently did not consent to that, and believed that the price should be lowered, and it reduced the price to be paid as provided in the bill.

Then, in order that the Government might have some control and that there might be competition at least between the Government and private parties, the additional appropriation for the government plant was made and is carried in the bill, and is in the provision as it comes to us from the House, which will substantially double its present power. It will furnish the Government two-thirds of what is needed by the Government in any ordinary time of peace.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If it will not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. HALE. Not at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to inquire right in this connection what quantity of powder, outside of that for small arms, is required by the navy annually?

Mr. HALE. In ordinary times about 3,000,000 pounds.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So we now manufacture about one-third?

Mr. HALE. About one-third under the present capacity.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And the enlarged capacity provided for will about double that?

Mr. HALE. It will about double the present production.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is this amount required in time of peace. Now, right in this connection I ask the Senator to state, if he will, why it would not be advisable to manufacture the entire amount required in time of peace and to provide for it in this bill.

Mr. HALE. That is a very large question. The whole business of the Navy Department has gone on with two things in view—the work by the Government in its navy-yards and the encouragement that is given in building up private establishments which in a way compete with the government establishments. I think one of the great benefits which have been derived from our policy of increasing the navy has been not only to build the ships, to build up the navy-yards, but to increase outside plants, competing plants, so that the labor of the country, which is vast compared with the limited number of laborers in navy-yards, shall be helped; and to me it is more a matter of pride that we have built up such great establishments where the workmen from the ranks of labor, and not special employees of the department, find employment—the great establishments in Philadelphia, Newport News, Fore River, California, and everywhere else. Therefore it has never been the policy in this matter for the Government to do everything. But competition——

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Maine permit a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I have not risen to criticise the bill or the committee. I do not expect to be informed fully about the bill, because I recognize the necessity of following committees if we do anything at all in the Senate. But I have an interest to know whether it is the opinion of the committee that the Government should manufacture all its powder, and whether they intend to make arrangements in the future that it shall manufacture all its powder.

Mr. HALE. That is a question which has to be settled by Congress, between the two Houses. What I was going on to say was——

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator permit me for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. Of course I understand very well that Congress must decide it, but what I want to know is what is the view of the committee at present. From the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire it seemed we could anticipate a programme as to powder manufacture by which the Government could do its own work. I am one of those who do not believe that the Government ought to do all its work in that particular, and hardly any of it. I think it is just as important that we should have private manufactories of gunpowder as that we should have private shipyards and other private establishments, and if that is the opinion of the committee, I simply want to be informed, and I think the public are interested in knowing.

Mr. HALE. I will tell the Senator just what I think is the attitude of the committee.

The bill as it passed the House contained, as I have said, three features that were against the monopoly, whatever that monopoly may be. It lowered the price; it provided that an additional amount should be given to the government factory to increase its plant, and provided that no contract should be made with a monopoly which was contravening the statutes of the United States. The outcome of the House legislation was against whatever monopoly there is and was a triumph for those who want to limit and curtail that monopoly.

What the committee has supposed, what I have supposed, and what will happen, is that when the bill is completed and the committee amendments have been considered there will be an effort made not in the direction we are talking about now, but to contravene the House legislation, to interfere with the lower prices that have been fixed, and to interfere with the prohibition to deal with a monopoly. I have supposed that when the question was raised not to increase the restrictions which the House have put on, but to remove them, the Senate would then consider this whole subject-matter.

I have no doubt that whoever furnishes this powder can furnish it even cheaper than the House has provided for; but it has to be remembered that the Government in producing it has spent large sums of money and will spend large sums of money in building up a plant. I have supposed, to repeat, that when we have reached the end of the consideration of the bill and amendments are offered, an amendment will be offered not in the direction of the present suggestions, but to relieve the manufacturers of powder who are now furnishing it to the Government, and then the Senate will come into contact with the actual questions here. But there are no committee amendments at present pending.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Maine was not in the Chamber at the time this discussion began and it has all proceeded from a very plain and simple question propounded by myself, which related to the very subject just under consideration by the Senator from Maine. I am sorry it drifted away into a discussion with regard to the propriety of the Government entering into the further manufacture of powder, for it was not my purpose to begin any such discussion by propounding the question that I did.

This is the question. Whatever may be our opinions with regard to the merits of any of these questions, there is one thing the Senate can not afford; it can not afford to be unfair; it can not afford to join in any scheme or pretext. When the amendment with regard to trusts and combinations that is found in lines 19, 20, 21, 22, and 23, on page 17, was added in the House to the bill completed there, it was almost universally construed throughout the country, especially in the newspapers, to be a prohibition against the Government's purchase of any of its powder for use in the Navy Department from a trust or combination in restraint of trade, save in the event of an emergency. My question propounded to the Senator from New Hampshire was, Does the Committee on Naval Affairs believe that this prohibition does relate to all the powder that is provided for in the bill, or does it relate to only a very small part of the powder that will be bought by the Government for the use of the navy?

We can not afford to put forth a bill which will be misunderstood and misconstrued. I am expressing, as I said, no hint as to whether we should include in the bill any prohibition against purchase from a trust or combination, but we ought to use such language upon the subject as will be easily understood by every intelligent person.

Therefore, I conclude by asking the Senator from Maine, who undoubtedly is more familiar with the bill than any other person, Is the limitation contained in lines 19, 20, 21, 22, and 23, upon page 17, a limitation also upon the purchase of the powder provided for in lines 24 and 25 of that page and upon the powder to be purchased under lines 9 and following, upon page 19?

Mr. HALE. I should say, Mr. President, without any doubt, that it is intended to apply generally, and the Senator from New Hampshire, who kindly took my place and I have no doubt did better than I would have done, now tells me that that was his answer. I should have no doubt that it applies to all these purchases.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to answer otherwise.

Mr. HALE. I look upon it, I will say to the Senator from Iowa, as a very restrictive and drastic provision. I do not think that I should be in favor of striking it out. Undoubtedly when we reach the end of the bill amendments other than the committee amendments are to be considered which can not be considered now. Undoubtedly there will be a motion then made to strike that out, and perhaps good reasons will be given for it, but as the matter stands now I am not in favor of contravening in any way or qualifying the attitude taken by the House. I read the debates very carefully. I think there was a very strong feeling there that there should be not only a restriction in price, a limitation as to monopoly, but increased competition by the Government provided through an increased appropriation to enlarge the government plant.

What I had supposed would happen would be that when we reached the end of the bill we should be confronted with amendments that cut away the House provisions and reduce them and bring them more nearly back to the old condition. At present I am not in favor of that. The committee, I will say, were asked to strike out this proposition and to change the limit of price and to leave things as they were before. The committee believed that all of the House propositions which I have recited—for a lower price, exclusion of monopoly, and government competition—should not be interfered with.

So, as far as I can, I have answered the question of the Senator. I have no doubt we shall meet all these questions. Under the rule prescribed there are no such amendments now pending and there can be none, but we shall have plenty of amendments when we get through with the committee amendments asking us to recede from the House proposition. Then the Senate will confront the whole thing.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know that I have the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri for a question.

Mr. STONE. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine a question. The bill carries in the aggregate rather large appropriations for the purchase of powder. Is it supposed that that powder is necessary for the use of the navy during the fiscal period covered by the bill?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I suppose it is just that. While we are at peace and there is no enemy in sight either for the present or the future, we are burning up and exploding and getting rid of an immense amount of powder every year, an amount that in any old war would have been considered sufficient for the war. Our ships are all the time cruising about experimenting in gunnery, target practice, and using up powder. They need every year an immense amount of it.

Mr. BACON. Is not the Senator aware that more powder is used in firing salutes than in firing at targets?

Mr. STONE. This appropriation, then, is intended to meet the necessities of the navy?

Mr. HALE. The everyday necessities.

Mr. STONE. For the time covered by the bill?

Mr. HALE. The everyday necessities without war.

Mr. TILLMAN. In time of peace.

Mr. STONE. It is presumed it will be a time of peace during the period for which this appropriation is made. The Senator approves of what has been done elsewhere, which his committee has indorsed by its report, the restrictions placed upon the purchase of powder from a monopoly or a combination in restraint of trade. I wish to have the well-informed judgment of the Senator upon this question: First, who is to determine when the purchase is made whether it is made of a combination in restraint of trade or a monopoly? It is a fact, I think, established and generally conceded that all the powder now purchased and which for many years has been purchased by the Government has been bought of what is popularly known as "the powder trust," against which a proceeding has been instituted in some federal court of Philadelphia or Delaware. I gathered from what I read of the debates in the House and the hearings there that it was conceded that the Government made about one-third of the powder that is needed.

Mr. HALE. Now?

Mr. STONE. Now; and it purchases the other two-thirds of this one source of supply.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. STONE. If this quantity of powder is actually needed for the next year, for example, by the navy for its necessary uses, and we make but one-third of it, from what source is the other two-thirds to be obtained? It must come, as my information goes, from what is denominated "the powder trust," which is popularly supposed to be a combination in restraint of trade.

Now, my question is, Shall the officers who administer this law determine what is and what is not a combination in restraint of trade, what is or is not an industrial monopoly; and, secondly, if we find that we must purchase two-thirds of the powder that we need and can get it but from this one source, is there not an emergency raised under the very terms of this proviso that would enable the department to purchase from that supposed monopoly? Therefore, if that be true, is this provision effective? Is it not a mere pretense, a fraud on its face?

Mr. HALE. No; it is not a pretense or a fraud. The other branch, I have no doubt, was entirely sincere about it; but it is a question as to how adequate the provision is. We may as well look things in the face. I do not know how effectual the provision would be. I do not know how it would be construed and what an emergency is under it. That has got to be left to the administrative officers. What I am interested in is to know what we can do. If we give the amount the House has given and double the capacity of the Government plant, that can only get in operation some months from now. When we come back to the bill when amendments are proper, if we give money enough for the Government to make all the powder, that will not cover the next year; it will take time. We shall proceed by gradual steps. It may be in the end it will be concluded that the Government shall make all of the powder we need at any time. This concern would then be driven out.

But we can not cover the next year by whatever we do. We must have something left to the decision of the administrative part of the Government. I suggested to the Senator from Iowa, whose very natural question raised this discussion, as there is no amendment pending, and under the rule there can be none, there being no committee amendment, what I supposed would be done is to let all this matter go until we reach the end of the bill, and then any amendment will be in order, either from the friends of the House measure, who are likely to offer them, or from those who are opposed to the House measure, so that we may go on with the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Maine I did not dream that my question would provoke any considerable discussion, and it was for the very purpose of preparing the minds of Senators so that they would examine this part of the bill that I asked it.

I now repeat, so that Senators may recall the real question that I asked. The Naval Committee declares that it was its purpose to attach this restriction with respect to purchases from monopolies or trusts and combinations to all powder purchased by the Government. I simply submit that Senators will see, if they will examine the bill carefully, that the restriction is not placed upon more than one-hundredth part of the powder purchased by the Government, and if the bill is to be brought into harmony with the desire of the Committee on Naval Affairs the restriction will have to be very much broadened.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to interpose another inquiry at this point, because it may be helpful in determining whether any Senator desires to offer an amendment, not at this time, but when the provision comes up again in regular order. If the information could be elicited now, it might prevent the offering of amendments at that time and save much time then.

I wish to inquire of the Senator from Maine if he can inform me whether any portion of the powder purchased by the Government last year was purchased from the powder trust?

Mr. HALE. I do not know; I presume it was.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to make this further inquiry: How many companies are manufacturing the powder in question outside of the powder trust—that is, independent companies—if the Senator from Maine can inform me?

Mr. HALE. From the reading of the hearings and the debate in the House, I get the impression that the Central Powder Company has practically absorbed most of the outside manufactories. I can not say to what extent, but I think from what I have done in looking up the matter a great many of the outside establishments have been substantially merged and are controlled by the Central Powder Company. Just to what extent that goes I do not know, but I have no doubt, if the Senator will read the debates—and probably he has—he will find that that consideration moved the House in putting in this prohibition.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The question that suggested itself to my mind was whether the Government in the event of an emergency would be forced to depend upon the powder trust, or whether there were independent and competing companies that could supply any demand in case of an emergency.

Mr. HALE. I suppose if a war should break out to-morrow the only question would be that we have got to have powder. I think that would be a clear case of emergency. We should have to get almost all of the powder, all that we can not manufacture ourselves, from this monopoly, and I have no doubt they would do what they did before when we were in trouble—put the price away up—and we would have to stand it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But what I was endeavoring to ascertain was whether there were not independent companies enough, outside of this trust, to supply the demand, even in such an emergency as that suggested by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I am afraid not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Because the point of my inquiry would go to the advisability of offering amendments when we return to this provision again.

Mr. HALE. I presume, as I have said, that there will be amendments offered on both sides, undoubtedly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill on page 17, line 24, and read to the end of the clause, from line 24, page 17, to line 3, on page 18, as follows:

Purchase and manufacture of smokeless powder, $650,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for powder other than small-arms powder at a price in excess of 64 cents a pound.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maine will permit me to ask him a question, I will say that I understood the paragraph which has been under discussion is the one which contemplates the purchase of powder. I simply desire to know why is this specification in addition to what has been previously reported—$5,528,171.99. As I understand, a part of that appropriation was for powder, was it not?

Mr. HALE. Yes; a small part of it.

Mr. BACON. The appropriation of $5,528,171.99?

Mr. HALE. That is principally for ordnance.

Mr. BACON. Is the powder, to which the clause we have been discussing has allusion, the powder to which the provision just read refers?

Mr. HALE. That is an additional provision which the House put on after a contest.

Mr. BACON. I have no criticism to make on the fact that the amount is specified there. I think it would be very fortunate if it were specified in the preceding provision, but I do not know. I supposed possibly there was some reason why there was a general appropriation embracing a dozen different articles in which there was no specification, and then, immediately following, another provision in which there is a specification.

Mr. HALE. That is put on as an addition.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed on page 18, line 4, and continued to the end of the clause from line 12 to line 14, on page 18, as follows:

For Naval Gun Factory, Washington, D. C.: New and improved machinery for existing shops, $150,000.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, concerning the item of $150,000 for the Naval Gun Factory at Washington, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Naval Committee if all of the large guns of the navy are made at that gun factory, or are there other navy-yards where guns are manufactured? To what extent are the large guns made here at the Naval Gun Foundry at Washington?

Mr. HALE. In some cases the guns are what is called "assembled" at other establishments, but they are all completed and made ready for service in the Washington yard; and as we appropriate for that yard, the jurisdiction of the yard is all the time more and more extended. I understand that all the guns, particularly of the larger caliber, are completed at this yard and issued from it.

Mr. DIXON. Even down to 3-inch guns and the rapid-fire guns?

Mr. HALE. I do not know about that.

Mr. DIXON. But the larger pieces of ordnance are made here at Washington?

Mr. HALE. Yes; that is the object. It is not like any other navy-yard. It is an ordnance yard.

The reading of the bill was resumed on page 18, at line 15, and continued to the end of the clause from line 18 to line 24, on page 25, as follows:

PUBLIC WORKS, BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS.

Navy-yard Portsmouth, N. H.: Rebuilding and fireproofing building No. 20, $43,500; electric capstan for quay wall, $3,000; foundry building (to cost $200,000), $50,000; in all, $96,500.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, at this point the naval appropriation bill for the next several pages contains so much that is of public interest that I think it would not be amiss for the information of the Senate and the public in general for the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate to make a general statement regarding the whole question of navy-yards and docks, as it affects both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. Not in the spirit of captious criticism, but I want to say frankly that some days ago an article was called to my attention in one of the magazines of the country. I am not here to say that I accept magazine articles as gospel truth whenever they are printed; but this was such a pointed and specific and overwhelming general criticism of the whole policy of the naval appropriation bill for the current and past years that I think it made something of a profound sensation among many well-thinking men.

I remember a year ago the chairman of the Naval Committee made a statement to the Senate regarding the annual increased expenditures for the maintenance of the American Navy. I know how popular a thing it is to vote for big naval expenditures in Congress, but the statement in the report accompanying this appropriation bill showing that in ten years the appropriations for the American Navy have increased from $50,000,000 to $137,000,000 for this fiscal year is really alarming.

I do not think we get these enormous figures in our minds unless we use a more familiar yardstick as compared with other matters. I noticed this morning a tabulated statement of the total assessed wealth of this country, State by State, with particular regard for the value of the farms, and the farming implements and stock, and, to my utter amazement, it appeared that the annual appropriation bill for the American Navy is greater than the total farm values in six or eight States of this Union. Every year, if the naval appropriation bill is going to be of the same magnitude as it is this year, we are feeding into the hopper of naval appropriations more than double the assessed farm values of half a dozen States of this great Republic.

Now, in particular, we are getting down into the items regarding the navy-yards. I know very little of the matter. I think none of the members of the Naval Committee come from the inland country. I believe it was stated in the article to which I refer that 10 or 12 members of the Naval Committee had navy-yards in their States, which led to the insinuation that appropriations were easy on the naval bill. The statement was made that in the past ten years we had expended upward of—I do not remember the number of million dollars, but several hundred million dollars in navy-yards that were practically on land.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The questions raised by the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] are so interesting and of such great public concern that, much against my desire, I feel impelled to suggest the absence of a quorum. I do not do this to obstruct business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators responded to their names:

Aldrich	Burrows	Dick	Fulton
Bacon	Carter	Dillingham	Gallinger
Borah	Clapp	Dixon	Gamble
Bourne	Clay	Dolliver	Guggenheim
Brandegee	Culberson	Elkins	Hale
Briggs	Cummins	Flint	Hemenway
Burkett	Curtis	Frazier	Heyburn
Burnham	Daniel	Frye	Kean
Kittredge	McEnery	Page	Smoot
Knox	Martin	Perkins	Sutherland
La Follette	Milton	Piles	Teller
Lodge	Money	Richardson	Tillman
Long	Nelson	Simmons
McCreary	Newlands	Smith, Md.
McCumber	Nixon	Smith, Mich.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. DIXON. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] for his thoughtfulness in the matter. Now, inasmuch as the presence of a quorum has been developed, I think we should have the attention of the Senate.

I started to say that I thought it was due the Senate to have a general statement regarding the many charges that have been printed in the last month concerning the great expenditures made by Congress for the maintenance of the navy and of the navy-yards. I remember, I think, that the article in question stated that on the navy-yards up and down the Atlantic coast and the two on the Pacific coast, $110,000,000, as I recall the figures, had been spent in the years since the Spanish-American war, and that we did not have at this time a navy-yard where we could dock more than two battle ships at one time; and, I think, not over two docks where we could really dock a battle ship that was crippled and crept into a friendly harbor under stress of battle.

What I wanted to call the attention of the Senate and the country to was that, taking a different yardstick of measurement, the present naval bill, carrying $137,000,000, is practically $20,000,000 in excess of the total value of the farms and their equipment in the great State of Maine, and greater in amount than the farm values in six or eight States of the American Union.

What is going to be the limit of naval expenditure, in the opinion of the chairman of the Naval Committee; and I submit there is no living man who knows more about the matter than does that distinguished Senator? Will the expenditures and the appropriations for the navy for the next five years increase in the same ratio that they have in the past ten years? Is there going to be a limit?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. CLAPP. I should not like to usurp the functions of the Senator from Maine, but I want to make the prediction that if we constantly protest against these increased appropriations without ever commencing to reduce them, they will continue increasing in the ratio.

Mr. DIXON. That is certainly true, based on the experience of the last ten years; but, as was well stated by the chairman of the Naval Committee a year ago—and it struck me with peculiar force at the time—this great Republic, not seriously threatened, as I view it, by war, isolated, as we are, is spending each year 66 per cent, as I remember the figures, of its total revenues on the navy, the army, coast fortifications, and pensions. Over two-thirds of the revenues of this great peaceful Republic are going into expenditures for past and future wars, leaving a little over 30 per cent of the revenue to be devoted to the great expenditures for peaceful pursuits and occupations.

The article that I have especially in mind made the bald statement that some of the navy-yards mentioned in this bill in the items now under consideration, on which we would expend $200,000 or $300,000, last year only produced practically $10,000 worth of work. I remember one particularly where we had spent $300,000 for machine shops that had never been used, except for storage purposes. There is item after item of this kind. If the charges are not true, the country ought to know it. We should not stand under the terrible indictment contained in an article of that kind, which has been scattered broadcast over the country. If these things are so, it is a crime for this Congress to continue these great appropriations. This bill, carrying almost $138,000,000, greater by far than most of the great appropriation bills that the Congress passes, was being considered this afternoon, until the Senator from Wisconsin made the point of no quorum, with not 15 Senators present on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DIXON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I interrupt the Senator in order that I may say in my own defense that while I was absent from the floor of the Senate and was unable to get here to answer the call of the Senate I was absent on duty, working in the committee room on the appropriation bill for the army. But inasmuch as

I happened to be absent and was not here to help the Senator to consider the bill, I wish to ask him what amendments he has offered striking items out of this bill, if any at all?

Mr. DIXON. None whatever; because, as I understand, the bill is being read for committee amendments only.

But I had started to say that at this time I thought we ought to have some kind of an explanation from the great Senator who has been at the head of this committee for the last twenty years.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. HALE. I agree fully with the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] that the aggregate of this bill is alarming, and the statement of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is very pregnant, that if we do not start at some time cutting down appropriations we will find these bills increasing every year.

When the Senator says he is alarmed by this bill carrying $137,000,000, does he know that out of that great total the entire amount in the bill devoted to work in the navy-yards is only $4,844,000?

The public, Mr. President, has been misled and mistreated and misinformed by the crusades that have been made upon what are called the "enormous appropriations for navy-yards," and the Senate has been slandered. If the Senator will look at the figures he will find that of the aggregate of these enormous bills the appropriations for navy-yards have been very small indeed, and do not constitute a large item in the expenditures. When the Senator says that hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent upon navy-yards in useless buildings, and all that, he has not looked at the figures. The entire appropriations for navy-yards for a series of years are small, very small, compared with the entire appropriation, and smaller than in rival countries. I have here a comparative statement of appropriations of this country and England for navy-yards and stations running over a long period of time.

The statement is headed "Comparison of appropriations for naval public works in Great Britain and the United States during the fiscal years 1896 to 1909, inclusive." What does the Senator suppose that for three great navy-yards, with some small stations, Great Britain has appropriated in that time for these public works, which have been talked about and exaggerated and falsehoods told about by the magazines and some of the press of the country? What does the Senator suppose during those fourteen years our appropriations for all these yards have been compared with the British? For the British yards—they have only three large yards—$126,987,550; for the United States public works in navy-yards up to this time, $51,015,864. The figures for navy-yards, for everything spent upon them, compared with the aggregate of big bills that frighten Senators, as they ought to, are small indeed; and if the Senator will look at the figures and compare them with other things, he will find that all these charges fall to the ground.

The whole appropriation this year, as I have shown, including the increase, is only $4,800,000 for all the yards. The Senate has made an increase over the House only of about $800,000, and that only for a few yards. If the Senator will go over the record from the time when we began to build up this enormous navy and spend millions upon millions, he will see that the pay alone in one item in this bill is eight times as much as the entire appropriation for all the public works in the navy-yards; the items for armor and armament and hulls and machinery are, every one of them, from four to six times as much as all the appropriations for navy-yards.

The truth is, Mr. President, that the appropriations for navy-yards have undoubtedly in some cases been duplicated, and that is what the present Secretary of the Navy and what this bill cut up from the roots. There have been buildings erected in these navy-yards, there have been duplicates of power plants and mechanic shops, and all that, and that is all being cured and will have no existence hereafter. But even with all of that, with all the errors—and I do not say there have not been errors—instead of the navy-yards and the expenditures upon the public works in the navy-yards figuring as a very great amount, swelling the appropriation bills, the truth is precisely the reverse.

I shall put it into the RECORD before this debate ends more extensive comparisons which I have here, for ten years, showing that the hue and cry that has been raised about the enormous cost of the navy-yards has no foundation.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. I know it is utterly impossible for the Government ever to do as cheaply as private firms or individuals can do. But is it not a matter of fact that up and down the Atlantic coast navy-yards which have come down to us from a former generation—yards that were established in the days of the old wooden sailing ships, which at that time were well fitted for the purpose—have been continued year after year and appropriations made year after year for improvements there when under modern conditions, with the big battle ships, they are practically worthless as naval bases and navy-yards, as the public understands generally?

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President, that is not true. The reverse is true. When this great fleet finds its way into the Atlantic waters of the coasts of the United States and the reckoning is made up and the housekeeping is taken into account and it is seen what those great ships need in the way of reconstruction, repairs and overhauling we shall not have navy-yards on the Atlantic coast to accommodate them. You can not send a fleet of 16 battle ships—with all the auxiliaries and everything that we can furnish and everything that we can hire abroad, as we have done with this great squadron—on a cruise around the globe and bring it home for repairs without the ships being taken into navy-yards, and we will not have navy-yards enough. I do not know one of the Atlantic navy-yards from Portsmouth to Portsmouth where they can not and will not be taken and docked for repairs.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has just mentioned Portsmouth, and that is one of the yards which has been talked about a good deal by these magazine writers; and yet Portsmouth, when the fleet comes home, will have three of the battle ships assigned to her.

Mr. HALE. And will have to.

Mr. GALLINGER. She has but one dock, and it is one of the best docks in the world, but three of the battle ships have been assigned to the navy-yard at Portsmouth for repairs. I will venture to emphasize what the Senator from Maine has said, that when the ships come home, each one of them probably requiring a million dollars' worth of repairs to be put on it, instead of having a surplus of navy-yards we will not have navy-yards enough to accommodate them.

Mr. DIXON. I mention this in good faith and not in a spirit of criticism, because I do not know. I heard a naval officer of high rank make the statement within the last two or three days that with the navy-yards as they are, scattered up and down the coast, "little one-horse affairs," as he put it, in time of war if the fleet was crippled off the eastern coast, there was not a single navy-yard that would accommodate at one time anything like the number of battle ships which would constitute a fighting squadron.

Mr. HALE. I do not know who that naval officer was, and I do not care, but he had no business to make that statement. With the exception of the enormous ships that are provided for in the House bill this year, any ship that is now afloat—and they are the largest in the world, for we have to-day the largest ships afloat in the world and the best ships and the best guns—can go into Portsmouth and Boston and New York and Philadelphia and Norfolk; and every one of these yards will be needed to accommodate them, and we shall spend millions upon millions of dollars——

Mr. TILLMAN rose.

Mr. HALE. And Charleston.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was just going to remark that the Senator ought not to leave out Charleston.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was an inadvertence.

Mr. TILLMAN. Unless the coast survey officers and the engineers of the army are lying, we have about as much water there as at any other port on the coast.

Mr. HALE. We can not leave out the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Not when he belongs in. You will not leave him out then without his being heard from.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Montana is beginning to look into these things. He has taken the statements, the random statements, of naval officers.

Mr. DIXON. I am not taking any statement. I am asking what is the true condition.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is right about that. He has a right to ask, and I am trying to answer him. He does not know—it is no discredit to him that he does not know—how much of all of this stir that has been made and the charge that hundreds of millions of dollars have been wasted on our navy-yards has no substantial foundation. It has been a small figure compared with the other enormous expenditures, and it is done with the purpose of diverting attention from other enormous expenditures. That is the purpose; and the Senator will do well to look into other items of expenditure that overtop all the expenditures for navy-yards by three times and four times and six times and ten times.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to know to what the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee refers. What are the overwhelming expenses?

Mr. HALE. I have mentioned pay, which in itself is eight times all that is appropriated for navy-yards—pay alone; armament; increase of the navy; machinery and hulls; armor; and even the distinctive bureau appropriations for coal are bigger than all the navy-yard appropriations.

Does the Senator know that we spend more for coal in one year, even if we do not circuit the waters of the globe, than all the navy-yard appropriations aggregate? Does the Senator know that the appropriations in the bureau of construction and repair are 50 per cent larger than all the appropriations for navy-yards? Does the Senator know that the appropriations in steam engineering and for ordnance are every one of them larger than the appropriations for navy-yards?

Mr. DIXON. Does the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, in making this statement, include merely the repairs and expenditures for navy-yards, or does he take into consideration the cost of the officers and the men and the clerks maintained at all these naval establishments? Of course, we can take the tables and figure out pure expenditures of construction, but when you come to get at the actual cost of the navy-yards, it means the great army of men who are employed there locally. It means not only the actual cost of repair and construction, but the side issues that go with the maintenance of it.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator going to abolish navy-yards?

Mr. DIXON. Not at all.

Mr. HALE. There is another feature. These men are doing the work. The outcry has been made that Senators have secured appropriations for public works in the navy-yards aggregating hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator allow me to ask just one or two more questions, so that he can make his statement more comprehensive? Would it not be a better plan, instead of maintaining so many little navy-yards up and down the Atlantic coast, to have three or four great big naval establishments and naval bases where in time of stress and trouble you could put a whole squadron in the docks and take care of it, rather than scattering them in a dozen navy-yards stretched for 800 miles up and down the coast? Would it not be a better and more economical and wiser general plan?

Mr. HALE. The English experiment does not show that. In a coast line which, compared with ours, is not so much as the circumference of one of these glasses in my hand compared with the moon almost, they have three big navy-yards, and the figures that I have shown disclose that in fourteen years they have spent on those navy-yards almost three times what we have spent on all our yards.

I think at the time when we were not building up an enormous navy and had a small force and were spending from twelve to twenty million dollars we might have got along with two or three navy-yards on the Atlantic coast.

I wonder if Senators realize that any administration—I do not think any other administration will ever send a fleet around the world; I hope not—has an elephant on its hands when it has thirty-odd battle ships, 15 or 20 armored cruisers, and 40 or 50 other ships? It has to do something; it has to send them somewhere; it has to keep them in all sorts of practice, all sorts of exercise; it has to keep spending money, consuming powder, with prizes for everything, and every year it has to bring the ships home, and they have to go in the navy-yards to be repaired. There is not one of these navy-yards which, while they will take in these ships, can dock more than one or two of them at most at a time.

Mr. DIXON. If the Senator will pardon me, that is exactly what I wanted to ask the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee. The establishments we now have hold only one or two battle ships. Would it not be a wiser general plan if we had three or four great naval establishments and yards that would accommodate six or eight battle ships at one time?

Mr. HALE. It would be more expensive undoubtedly. The English experiment shows that.

Mr. DIXON. To maintain three or four establishments than to maintain those we have?

Mr. HALE. Yes. The British experiment shows that it cost two and a half times what all of our navy-yards had for public works.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the fact that at Gibraltar, which is only seven or eight hundred miles from the southern coast of England, there is another great naval establishment, and then some thousand miles east, at Malta, there is a fifth? There are three on the coast of England, which is about as big as the State of Georgia.

Mr. HALE. Those are naval stations.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have been there and have seen the battle ships all in the docks.

Mr. HALE. I did not intend to debate this matter until we came to the paragraph which involves the vital question in this bill—the increase of the navy. But when the Senator came out with his statement and repeated the inconceivable statements made by the newspaper and the magazine press, I thought it was proper for me to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it is all based upon a fiction.

Mr. DIXON. I desire, in conclusion, to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs one other question. The charge has been repeated in the magazines and in the newspapers that the present navy-yards, with the exception of two or three only, can not accommodate a battle ship of the kind we propose to build now by the appropriation in this bill. Is that correct or not?

Mr. HALE. I did not quite hear the Senator. My attention was diverted.

Mr. DIXON. It has been repeatedly charged in the newspapers and in the magazines, and naval officers themselves have said, that the navy-yards which we now maintain—how many, 10 or 12, are there on the coast——

Mr. HALE. There are nine yards in all.

Mr. DIXON. That, I think, with only two or three exceptions, not one of them would permit the entrance of a battle ship of the type that we are now building, especially if she was water-logged or suffering from stress of battle. Is that the situation or not?

Mr. HALE. If you go on and provide for ships such as no other nation has, and which are four or five thousand tons larger than anybody has ever imagined or contemplated, what does the Senator expect—that navy-yards which have been dealing with smaller ships can be equal to the new and larger ships? That is one of the arguments that was used against these enormous ships—that they can get into only two or three yards. But is that the fault of the navy-yards? The navy-yards have docked and repaired all the other ships we have ever had. There has been no fault found with them.

Now, the Senator raises a new issue. We are asked to build a ship of dimensions and size such as no nation in the world has ever thought of building; a great, monstrous structure that has no equal or parallel or similarity hardly on the waters of the globe; and the Senator finds fault with the navy-yards, which have accommodated everything else, but can not accommodate these vessels. Of course, when you increase your size and make these leviathans of the deep you have to dredge your navy-yards; you have to make appropriations of money by millions in order to make space for them. But that is not a fault of the navy-yards, which have dealt with the ships we have built heretofore. It is a new condition, made by these monsters that are provided for in this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the Senator from Maine takes his seat I should like to ask him if he does not feel that the indictment brought by the Senator from Montana, in regard to these two proposed battle ships of 26,000 tons, is not an argument against the navy-yards but against these ships themselves? If we already have as big or bigger battle ships than any other nation in the two we ordered last winter of 21,000 tons, and we can accommodate those in our navy-yards, some 6 or 7 of them, is the fact that we are going to build two bigger than anybody else ever saw or ever dreamed of any indictment against the navy-yards, or is it an indictment against the folly of Congress in ordering these monsters?

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. The Senator from Maine is chairman of the committee. We were told four years ago on the floor of the Senate that the policy of Congress would be to construct one battle ship every year. I can turn to the RECORD and find where the Senator from Maine made that statement.

The senior member of the minority side of the Chamber on that committee has practically criticised the Committee on Naval Affairs for making a report in favor of two battle ships with a tonnage of 26,000. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has made a very severe arraignment of the Committee on Naval Affairs in regard to the construction of these two battle ships. The Senate to a large extent looks to the Committee on Naval Affairs to guide it as to what it ought to do. It is an easy matter to stand here and tell the people of the country that our naval appropriations have grown to $137,000,000 a year, and that we must stop; that our expenditures are exceeding our receipts. But what light does the Committee on Naval Affairs give the Senate in regard to the reduction? To stand here and talk every session of Congress in favor of economy in expenditures, and of stopping these enormous expenditures in the Navy Department, unless we vote to stop them, amounts to nothing.

Mr. HALE. I will tell the Senator——

Mr. CLAY. One minute. If the Committee on Naval Affairs had come into the Senate with a report in favor of the construction of one battle ship it would have shown the sentiment of the committee in favor of a reduction. But it comes here in favor of two battle ships, unheard of in size throughout the entire world, and we are told that there is not a single harbor which they can enter without the expenditure of a large amount of money for dredging.

Mr. HALE. I will tell the Senator. I do not have any great pride in my record. I thought at the time the Senator alludes to that one battle ship a year of the size we were then building—about 17,000 tons, before the English had developed any 26,000-ton ship, but an 18,000-ton ship, the Dreadnought—would keep the navy good.

But what happened? The next thing the President and the Navy Department came in with a programme of four enormous battle ships, and told us that no ship would be good if we did not authorize four of over 20,000 tons, about 21,000 tons—that the others would soon be obsolete—and we had to make a fight. I would be glad to cut it down to one ship. But we had almighty hard work in the House and here to keep it down to two battle ships of 20,000 or 21,000 tons. It was the best we could do, and there was an intimation then that hereafter we might be content with two battle ships. It did not suit me. One would have suited me.

But this year, after the declaration by the President and the Navy Department that what we needed were four battle ships of 20,000 or 21,000 tons, they come in with a programme that we need four battle ships of 26,000 tons; and the whole country is convulsed with a fury and a fever in favor of the navy, and the exploits of the navy in navigating the globe, and the reception it met with everywhere. They made the fight in the House, and tried to cut it down; tried to get one ship. Then they tried to defeat the project, and were beaten, and it comes over here.

I do not put the blame on anybody else in the Naval Committee. I reserved the right to vote for smaller ships or any ships, as other members of the committee did. But I take my responsibility, and I am as much accountable as anybody on the committee, for reporting the House programme, because we believed that under the conditions that was a suitable thing for the committee to do—to report the House programme, which had been carried through after a fight in the House, and bring it in for the Senate to consider.

Still, I am in favor of smaller ships, and in the condition of the Treasury I would be glad if we could get along with building one or even none now. But I do not expect we could carry that, and I take the responsibility with the other members.

Mr. CLAY. I misunderstood the committee. I thought the Naval Affairs Committee were unanimous in favor of two battle ships. I did not know that a minority report had been filed.

Mr. HALE. There is no minority report.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is no minority report, but there is a great disagreement of feeling in the matter, if the Senator will permit me, and we reserved the right to vote as we saw fit in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I think I stated that. I did not want to put the responsibility on anybody else. I was responsible. I thought it was better to report the House programme to the Senate.

Mr. McCREARY. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine a question. The bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs does not provide for two battle ships of 26,000 tons, as I understand. It says:

> Not exceeding $6,000,000 each, similar in all essential characteristics to the battle ship authorized by the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908.

The battle ships provided for in 1908 were 21,000 tons.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will read the hearings he will find that the reason for putting that language in is that the $6,000,000 provided for hull and machinery is the limitation and will build a 26,000-ton battle ship. That is the limitation. If we built the smaller ones of last year we could take $1,500,000 off of each ship. That is the limitation, and that is where they get the authority.

Mr. McCREARY. I understand that the language "similar in all essential characteristics to the battle ship authorized by the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908," does not regulate the tonnage.

Mr. HALE. It does not. If they had said "of like size and displacement" that would have ended it.

Mr. McCREARY. There has been so much said about 26,000-ton battle ships that I desired to hear an explanation of it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, while the Senator from Maine has the floor I should like to ask him whether the criticisms regarding the navy-yards do not inovlve also the large expenditures made by different bureaus in the navy-yards, and is it not the claim that they are so organized as to result in very extravagant administration? For instance, I find the one item of Bureau of Ordnance, $11,000,000. I presume that work is mainly done at the navy-yards. The Bureau of Equipment is $9,000,000. I presume that is done at the navy-yards. Then there come the public works, $4,000,000. I do not find any item here relating to the navy-yards themselves, though I imagine there must be some such item in the report of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator will find it under the heading of "Yards and docks."

Mr. NEWLANDS. That expenditure, I understand, relates simply to the physical expenditures upon the yards and docks themselves and not to the vast sums, aggregating in some instances $11,000,000, that are spent in the course of administration at the yards and docks.

As I understand it, the criticism is that these yards and docks are not so concentrated as to result in a diminution in the administrative expense. We all know that in great corporations the concentration of the plants is regarded as one of the essential things in administration.

Mr. HALE. That is just what the present Secretary has been doing, and we have not had a more able administrator and a better manager of business in the Navy Department in years than the present Secretary. The thing he has done in the navy-yards, for which I have never seen any credit given him in these attacks, is to concentrate all the work in the navy-yards where they have two or three bureaus and duplicate buildings, and all that, which, as I have said, is undoubtedly a fault, not in magnitude, as it has been claimed, but it is a fault. He has cured all that and he is doing it now. He is putting it on the basis this bill provides, which gives him material to work with in concentrating and making a most valuable reform in the administration. I have seen nobody who gives him credit for that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. What I say is not at all in the spirit of criticism, but simply for the purpose of obtaining information. I would call the Senator's attention to the fact, however, that we have here in this bill nearly $40,000,000 for new construction under the item of increase of the navy, and so I assume that the remaining $100,000,000 is for the cost of the administration of the existing navy.

The Senator gives us to understand that he and others in the committee have differed with the majority regarding a good deal of this new construction. It is possible that they may differ with the committee as to the expenses of administration; and of course it is under these two heads that we are to accomplish economy, if economy is to be accomplished.

I ask the Senator whether it would not be advisable for the Senators who object to these extraordinary expenditures both in construction and administration, instead of apparently acquiescing in the will of the majority of the committee, to present to the Senate a minority report, fortified by the facts and the information within easy reach of the able men on that committee?

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Did the Senator vote for the four battle ships last year?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I did not. I am offering an amendment to strike out all the battle ships from this bill and to substitute for this appropriation of $12,000,000 the construction of auxiliary ships, absolutely needed in the case of war, and without which our navy would be as helpless as the Senator from Maine well said one year ago—

> As a painted ship
> Upon a painted ocean.

I stand for a proportionate navy, not a disproportioned navy. I stand for a modern and a strong and a well-proportioned navy, not a navy so organized as a man would be who had big muscles, a big chest, and a big heart and was without legs or perhaps arms, or as an army would be without a commissary or quartermaster's department.

It is conceded that we have a navy that is absolutely unable to sustain itself in case of war. Our ships would be derelicts in the ocean without auxiliary ships, scouts, colliers, dispatch boats, transports, now almost wholly lacking. When our fleet made its cruise around the world we recall that we were obliged to call upon foreign nations for 27 of the colliers to supply them with coal. The Senator from Maine remarked at the last session of Congress that had war existed the law of neutrality would have prevented our securing those ships, and it was that condition of things which led him to say that our ships in case of war would be like—

A painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

What I wonder at is that a disproportionate bill is brought in again, notwithstanding the views of the Senator from Maine. I presume that he has been overruled in committee. He uttered at the last session words of warning and of prophecy. I assume that in that committee he has fought for an auxiliary navy, and he has fought to substitute these useful and necessary ships for the fighting ships called for by this bill; that he realizes it is necessary for us to cease the building of fighting ships until we secure the ships that are absolutely essential to support them in case of war.

We have little or no merchant marine in this country. Our protective tariff makes the cost of the construction of our war ships one-fourth more than anywhere else in the world. The high wages of this country make the cost of administration of these ships one-third more. Therefore in international transportation we are absolutely helpless against the competition of the world. The only suggestion is that we should create a merchant marine by large subsidies, and there is great opposition to building up a shipowning interest favored and subsidized by Congress, which will add its importunities to the other interests in this country, which claim that they have a property right in the favoritism of the Government.

I have been calling attention to this badly proportioned, this unsymmetrical, navy for three or four years. The Senator from Maine one year ago came to my rescue, and as the result of his intervention an appropriation was put in the naval appropriation bill of about $3,000,000 for three colliers.

I denounced it then as a lame and impotent conclusion. I was aware that the Senator from Maine must have had a hard struggle in this committee and that he was overruled by the judgment of the committee. My sympathy was with him then and my sympathy is with him now, when he brings into the Senate a bill making an appropriation, not as of last year for three colliers, but an appropriation for one collier and $12,000,000 for battle ships, to which $12,000,000 more will be added, I believe, for the cost of armor and armament, and only $900,000 for one ship of that auxiliary navy, which the Senator from Maine declared one year ago was absolutely essential to support our navy in case of war, so essential that he declared that no more fighting ships ought to be built until this want was filled.

Now, we have these two elements of construction and administration. I believe that $100,000,000 ought to cover every expenditure both of administration and of construction; and I believe that if we should pursue businesslike methods—the methods that are pursued by the corporations, by the great trusts, by the combinations of the country regarding their affairs—we would have better results.

I would have the Congress of the United States declare that hereafter the expenditures for the navy should be limited to $100,000,000. I would give the power to the President of the United States to organize a board or commission that would keep the expenditures within $100,000,000. I would give such a commission a comparatively free hand. I would put upon it great naval officers. I would put upon it the great constructors of the country, such men as Mr. Gary, of the steel trust, and such men as James J. Hill, of the Great Northern. I would put the big constructive talent of the country upon such a commission, and we would have results.

Congress is not a business body. I make no imputation upon it when I so declare. It is not organized for business purposes. It should lay down the general rules under which the great constructive works should be carried on; and the only way to carry them on is to give the Executive large power, holding the Executive to a strict responsibility for the exercise of that power, and limiting the expenditures within certain lines without too much detail, so as to absolutely control and limit the total expenditure without crippling efficient management and administration as to detail. It is this large power that we gave the President in the construction of the Panama Canal. It is this large power that we gave the Secretary of the Interior in the reclamation works. As a result we accomplished speedy, economical, effective work.

If we would only apply these businesslike methods to the navy of the country and limit the appropriations for construction and administration to $100,000,000, giving the Executive, with the aid of experts organized as a board or a commission or a committee, the full power to act within various subdivisions of the appropriation, we should find that affairs would be conducted in a businesslike way and with the celerity and the dispatch, the certainty and the economy with which affairs are conducted by the great corporations of the country.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I simply want to ask the Senator from Nevada, should we enter upon that field of legislation, if he does not think it would be well immediately thereafter to amend the Constitution by abolishing the Senate and House of Representatives?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not. I think we would have a very much more efficient Congress than we now have without changing at all its membership. I think we would have results that would be more satisfactory to the country than we have now.

Mr. BACON. I will say, Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I hope to see Congress rid itself of the attempt to do executive business, and I want it to place the executive power of the Nation in some one man or organization and hold it to strict responsibility.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator, I should like to say if the estimate in which the Senator evidently holds Congress is a true one, certainly something ought to be done to make it a stronger body than it is now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, this involves no imputation upon Congress—none whatever.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Nevada that there are just two things that I think he ought to try to accomplish before he does this. One is to have an emperor who will give orders and which a servile House and Senate will obey, and the other is that the California legislature shall be forbidden to sit while Congress is considering the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator entirely misapprehends me, as to the power that I would give the Executive. Congress has the control over the purse strings. I would not abate that control one inch. Congress has the power to inaugurate every national enterprise, and without its inauguration no enterprise can be conducted. The executive department of the Government is absolutely powerless save when exercising its constitutional powers or under the authority of an act of Congress. I would not have Congress act in the unbusinesslike manner presented by this bill and the report accompanying it, a report of only three pages, to enlighten us regarding the proposed expenditure of $137,000,000, with the knowledge imparted to us for the first time upon this floor that the committee itself, which, if this body is a business body, constitutes the board of directors, was divided, and yet nothing whatever shown in the report that such a division of sentiment existed.

We are entitled in the Senate and the country is entitled to the judgment of the minority members of the committee, if it be adverse to the recommendations and judgment of the majority. The fault in this whole procedure is that the committee does not limit the entire expenditures of the navy to a fixed sum, say, $100,000,000, and compel the executive department to square its demands and its estimates with such limitation, defining generally the sphere of action of the executive department, and holding it to a rigid responsibility for good work. If we will only do that we will have a Congress that will do its duty to itself and its duty to the country. As it is, these overwhelming expenditures have been increasing year after year. I refer to the report in 1888. Fourteen million dollars was the total expenditure. In 1908 the total expenditure was $129,000,000, and now these advances for 1909 come. If Congress is satisfied with these results, all well, but if these results are the subject of criticism upon the part of Congress, I submit it is time to change the methods under which Congress acts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss now the somewhat large question of the increase of the navy, which comes at a later period in the bill, but I wanted to say a single word in regard to the question which is before the Senate relating to the matter of navy-yards.

The navy-yards, Mr. President, have been in existence since practically we had a navy. The Portsmouth Navy-Yard was established in 1800, the Boston Navy-Yard in 1801, and the Washington Navy-Yard at the same time. The purpose of those yards when they were established was the construction of ships of war, but the purpose of the navy-yard in modern times is somewhat altered. We should be in a very unfortunate position if we did not have navy-yards. We should be absolutely at the mercy of the contractors. It is the existence of the navy-yards that enables us to get reasonable contracts for building ships. There is no doubt that the ships can be built more rapidly and more cheaply at private yards than in navy-yards, but the navy-yards are essential for repairs, and that is a large work in a modern navy.

Here, Mr. President, we have these great investments at different points. It is not merely the depth of water that is needed, or the frontage at the navy-yard, but it is essential also to be in the neighborhood of a population from which large bodies of labor can be quickly drawn, because there is a great rush of work in a navy-yard at a given time, and then there is a period, when the repairs are completed on the ships, of great slackness. It is therefore necessary to have a large labor market within easy reach of the navy-yard.

I wanted as an illustration merely to put in a certain memorandum in regard to the Boston yard about which I happen to know most. It is one of the oldest yards in the country. It is situated on the harbor of the second port in the country. It has a depth of water in its controlling channels leading to the navy-yard sufficient to float the largest ships now afloat, and those channels are being deepened under the projects adopted by Congress. It is in the neighborhood of a large labor market.

Now, as to the enormous expenditures, the Boston Navy-Yard is a fair illustration. During the period from 1883 to 1886 there were no appropriations. The yard was one of the closed yards. From 1887 to 1897, inclusive, there was $345,000 spent on the yard. From 1898 to 1908, inclusive, there was spent $5,424,000. That is the period, of course, of the upbuilding of the navy. From 1883 to 1908 the total amount spent on the yard was $5,570,000.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, in perfect fairness, I want to say in frankness, I am not making these criticisms except to find out the truth. The amount appropriated for the maintenance of the navy-yards, for the cost of construction and repairs, as a matter of business, does not represent one-half of the real cost of maintaining the navy-yard at Boston, does it?

Mr. LODGE. The figures I give represent the expenditures on public works and the cost of the maintenance of the yard. They do not represent the cost of the ordnance made. They do not represent the cost of the ships built or repaired. Of course that work must be done somewhere. We make all our guns here in Washington, for instance. If that work is not done in the Washington Navy-Yard it must be done somewhere else.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts pardon me? I feel deeply about this matter. As a matter of fact, the maintenance of all the navy-yards we now maintain costs the Government, does it not, three or four times what the cost would be if there were two or three big yards? The plants and machinery and equipment and captains and admirals and all the men would not then have to be duplicated as they are in the eight or nine places up and down the Atlantic coast at this time. Is not that largely the trouble with the cost of maintaining the navy at this time? Now, if it will not break right into the middle of the Senator's remarks——

Mr. LODGE. Not the least.

Mr. DIXON. If the article I referred to a while ago did not have some personal allusions I would ask to have it put in the RECORD.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think I am in it. I should like to have you put it in.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know whether I am in it or not, but I have not the slightest objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let muck-raking go on here as it goes on outside.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator what is the magazine?

Mr. DIXON. It is the February number of McClure's. I am told on good authority several months' work was put on the preparation of the figures. It is entitled "Our navy on the land," by George Kibbe Turner, in the February number of McClure's.

Mr. GALLINGER. There was a previous article in a New York magazine that was the most untruthful and slanderous that ever was printed. It dealt with all the navy-yards and with those Senators who happened to represent States that have navy-yards. I did not know but it was the article referred to.

Mr. DIXON. Oh, no; it is in McClure's for February.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Montana——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. I yielded to the Senator from Montana to ask a question, and was very glad to do it, but I should like to finish my speech before we go into a general debate.

Mr. DIXON. All right; the Senator will please excuse me.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator had not concluded his question, I yield to him further.

Mr. DIXON. As a sample, the writer, in speaking of two or three navy-yards, the cost of maintenance is compared with the cost of work turned out. I picked it up at random, and I notice the first is the one at New Orleans. The writer says:

> New Orleans, for example, was so unfortunate as to secure but $1,040.01 worth of work in the naval year of 1907. The cost of maintaining this station during that year was $97,178.49, while $308,332.35 more was expended, with rare optimism, on improvements. There were $41,644.37 worth of naval officers and enlisted men stationed about this establishment during that uneventful year, while $20,000 worth of marines guarded it day and night.

That is the item I wanted to call to the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts. It is not the amount appropriated for maintenance and repairs, but it is the side issues that are largely in excess.

Mr. LODGE. I suppose I understand the Senator's question. The figures that I read relate to what may be called public works, the appropriation for which comes under the heading of "Yards and docks"—that is, the maintenance, the upkeep of the yards, and the addition of new buildings. For example, in the Boston yard they had a stone dock too small for modern ships. They built another capable of docking any modern ship. That, of course, was a very large expenditure.

As to the civil establishment—and I suppose that is what the Senator refers to—the cost for ten years amounts to $95,904. That is something over $9,000 a year. The civil establishment at New Orleans, to which the Senator has referred, has cost a little over $2,000 a year—under $3,000 a year. That civil establishment includes the clerks and watchmen employed in the yard. It is a very small item, so small that I did not include it, because what I was discussing was the way the expenditures were classified each year under yards and docks, and the expenditure on the Boston yard, which I was taking as an illustration, has been $5,770,000.

Mr. President, as to the gain of concentration, you must have your navy-yards at great ports with deep water, where there are improved and deep channels, and you must have them within the vicinity, at least, of a labor market. We have a great sum invested in certain yards. I have here a statement of the present value of the Boston yard. The selling value of the real estate alone of that yard at this moment—it is right in the city—is $8,583,000, and the buildings, plants, docks, and establishments are worth $10,000,000 more. Those great plants and all of that valuable real estate could not possibly be duplicated.

You can not concentrate the work of the navy at New York. The cost of the amount of land you would have to buy there would be almost prohibitive. Besides, Mr. President, nothing could be more unfortunate for a country than to have all the repair shops for its fleet at one point. Should the enemy blockade that port you could not repair your fleet.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator from Massachusetts believe it to be good business policy for this Nation to maintain a navy-yard at Boston, equipped, as he says it is—and it doubtless is so equipped—and to duplicate that same machinery equipment and work only 65 miles distant, at Portsmouth?

Mr. LODGE. I think, Mr. President, under existing circumstances it is good business policy. If we were starting de novo and going to equip ourselves with navy-yards for the first time, I suppose we might distribute them somewhat differently. But we have great ports with the necessary conditions for navy-yards. I think, on the whole, they have been wisely distributed. You have at Portsmouth a greater depth of water, I think, than is found at any other naval establishment except at Puget Sound. You are within easy reach of a large labor market, not in Portsmouth itself, but within easy reach—the great labor market of Boston, where there are 1,200,000 people in the metropolitan district. Then there are the navy-yards at Boston, New York, League Island—another great manufacturing center—Norfolk, and one at Charleston, which is now in process of upbuilding. I am not familiar enough with it to say how far the work has progressed, but there is a fine harbor there and an increasing depth of water.

I think, Mr. President, that all of those yards are needed, and that to throw them away would be a simple waste of money. In obtaining new accommodations you would have to spend a great deal more money than these yards have cost, for all the land in the neighborhood of navy-yards is of very high value.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, I will say there is one question that has not been cleared up in this discussion. I desire to know of the Senator from Massachusetts whether the Boston Navy-Yard has a dry dock?

Mr. LODGE. It has two dry docks.

Mr. NELSON. That can dry dock one of the largest battle ships?

Mr. LODGE. It has two dry docks.

Mr. NELSON. Has the Portsmouth Navy-Yard a dry dock?

Mr. LODGE. It has one of the largest in the world.

Mr. NELSON. That can dock one of the biggest battle ships?

Mr. LODGE. It can.

Mr. NELSON. How many naval stations are there where a battle ship can be dry docked, and at what points are they?

Mr. LODGE. Portsmouth and Boston each have one capable of docking the most modern and the largest ships. New York, I think, has two—one a wooden dry dock.

Mr. GALLINGER. Four in all; two modern ones.

Mr. LODGE. Four in all; two modern ones.

Mr. NELSON. I mean capable of dry docking one of the biggest battle ships.

Mr. LODGE. There is one at Norfolk.

Mr. TILLMAN. And one at Charleston. We have one at Charleston that will dock the largest ship you people will give us, and repair it, too.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to say one at Charleston and one at League Island.

Mr. NELSON. I do not mean those docks where you have deep water, where a vessel can steam up alongside the wharf, have coal and supplies put on and repairs made while in the water. I mean dry docks that can take ships out of the water.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I understood the Senator. They are large stone dry docks, capable of docking the largest ships.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to put into the RECORD that on the Pacific coast we have a dry dock with 30 feet of water on the sill, and at San Francisco it is the same way.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator that nobody is assailing the Pacific coast. All admit that we have not enough yards there.

As the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] asks that I give a list of these yards, I will give it at once.

Portsmouth has a new modern dock, 750 feet; Boston has two, a small one and a modern one, 750 feet; New York has one of wood, 668 feet, and one granite, 585 feet. League Island has one, 754 feet—one of the most modern and one of the largest; Norfolk has one of granite, 550 feet; Charleston has one of stone and concrete, 575 feet. The largest docks are those at League Island, Portsmouth, and Boston. Mare Island has one, 752 feet, and Puget Sound has one of stone and concrete.

Mr. PERKINS. There are two docks at Mare Island.

Mr. LODGE. Yes. I do not want anyone to suppose that I suggested that the Senator from California had neglected Mare Island. [Laughter.]

Mr. NELSON. What is the length of a 26,000-ton battle ship?

Mr. PERKINS. About 550 feet.

Mr. NELSON. Can they get into the present dry docks with these new ships?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; every one of them.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. DIXON. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that only two of these naval stations would admit the great battle ships which we propose to build under this bill.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is speaking now of the depth of water?

Mr. DIXON. Yes; and I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. LODGE. I think the depths are, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. DIXON. I think the chairman of the Naval Committee made that statement, as I understood, a while ago. Speaking of these dry docks, can a battle ship get into the dock at New Orleans up the river?

Mr. LODGE. There is a dry dock at New Orleans.

Mr. DIXON. I will ask the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY] to make a statement on that point.

Mr. MCENERY. Mr. President, I will answer that question by stating that the trouble is that the Navy Department is following a policy to starve all the other navy-yards, if possible, in order eventually to have them abolished, with the exception of Norfolk and New York. They have made war on the naval station at New Orleans almost from its establishment. That station is equipped for repairing battle ships of the United States Navy. It is prepared to make plates for them, place them, and repair every part of the machinery. It has a channel that will carry any battle ship there at the present time of the tonnage of the Louisiana, which has visited that port and gone through it without any difficulty, and in a short time a 35-foot channel will be permanent. It has a dock capable now of docking any battle ship up to the displacement of the Connecticut. It has a dry dock there which, with a little improvement by simply putting in a section, a telescope, will be able to dock any ship that is now being built by the Government, or any which possibly may be built within the next fifteen or twenty years.

If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, I will merely make one other statement. I state that the article which has been read by the Senator is full of misstatements from beginning to end. There is hardly any truth in it, or just enough to make the article plausible. The Senator says he understood the writer took months in preparing it. I have no doubt of it. It was never prepared where it was published, but was evidently prepared here by officers connected with the Navy Department, and in pursuance of the policy of the department to abolish these navy-yards and build up a great station at Guantanamo—apparently that is their object—on the ground that that is a strategic point, though it is not nearly as much so as the naval station at New Orleans, which was selected by one of the ablest officers in the navy, then Captain, afterward Admiral, Bunce, who visited all the gulf ports under an act of Congress authorizing the selection of a station in the Gulf. Certainly there was no officer in the navy who was more capable of selecting a station both for its safety and its strategic value with reference to fleets in the Gulf.

What is the use of building up a great station in Cuba? To protect the Isthmus of Panama? I say that we might be at war with every nation in Europe, and not one of them would ever attempt to destroy the Isthmian Canal, for the simple reason that we are building it for them and not for ourselves. We have not got a ship to send through it, and Congress somehow has not had the wisdom to build up a merchant marine that would necessitate our building fortifications in order to protect the Isthmus.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Speaking of the Portsmouth Navy-Yard, I have been informed that a battle ship could not enter the dock save at the turn of the tide and that it must make the passage in ten minutes. Is that true?

Mr. LODGE. I will allow the Senator from New Hampshire to answer that.

Mr. CUMMINS. And that no battle ship ever did enter the dock except at that time?

Mr. GALLINGER. That was true until a recent improvement was made in the channel. I will say to the Senator that not many weeks ago the new battle ship Maine steamed up to the Portsmouth Navy-Yard under her own steam, without the aid of tugs, and went out in the same way. There is no difficulty with the Portsmouth Navy-Yard. It has a very wide channel.

Mr. CUMMINS. Did it enter while the tide was running either way?

Mr. GALLINGER. Unquestionably.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the question I asked.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let me tell the Senator what the depth of water there is.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know the water is abundantly deep, but the tide is tremendously strong, is it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. The tide is strong, but there is no difficulty now. The channel is wide enough for any ship to go up to the Portsmouth Navy-Yard under her own steam without any difficulty whatever.

Mr. CUMMINS. And at any time of the day?

Mr. GALLINGER. At any time of the day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In order to clear up the matter further, I wish to ask one more question of the Senator from New Hampshire, if I have the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And the consent of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This is the question: Whether it is possible for a vessel such as the Maine or any other battle ship to go into the Portsmouth Navy-Yard with the tide running in, and whether a battle ship going in with the tide will obey her helm?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think there is no difficulty whatever. Nobody else has discovered that trouble.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me ask the Senator if he has personal knowledge upon this subject which enables him to say that any vessel ever docked there excepting at slack water, between the tides?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I can definitely say that that has been done; but even if it were so that a vessel could not dock except between tides, I suppose it would not be a public calamity for a vessel to wait a little while to go into a navy-yard.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is a matter, perhaps, to be argued out with more fullness in this connection.

Mr. GALLINGER. She would not have to wait outside over six hours. She would get in in due time. I have never heard the suggestion made that there was any trouble at any time for a vessel to go into the Portsmouth Navy-Yard. The Chester went in and went out; and she is a very large ship.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask if the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire has ever been directed to this particular point, that a vessel can not go in with the tide because she can not obey her helm, and that she can not go in against the tide because of the narrowness of the channel and the danger due to the swirls and whirlpools that prevail there?

Mr. GALLINGER. The channel is a thousand feet wide, I think, where a vessel would go in.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me ask the Senator from New Hampshire if the channel between the rocks is to exceed 300 feet in width?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; it is nearly a thousand feet. We recently removed rocks to a width of more than 300 feet.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. At what cost was that?

Mr. GALLINGER. At a cost of about $700,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What rock was that?

Mr. GALLINGER. That was Hendersons Point. In the old charts it is put down as "Pull-and-be-Damned Point."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; or sometimes called "Profanity Point," I believe.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will find the name I have mentioned on the chart. I would not have mentioned it if it was not printed on the old charts.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In applying the scale to the topographic chart of Portsmouth, it seemed to me that the passage did not exceed 100 yards as it now exists since the blasting at the point to which the Senator has directed attention.

Mr. GALLINGER. The difficulty is that the Senator is misinformed. The fact is that ships have gone there and have gone out, and there has been no trouble. Now, what is the good of arguing it? The Chester went in, and she is a very large ship, and she went out under her own steam. The battle ship Maine went in and went out under her own steam.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The battle ship Maine is the only battle ship that ever went in, is it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the only one we have had occasion to take in. We will take in the New Hampshire after a little while.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that an order has been made to take in the New Hampshire and to take in the Wisconsin.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; the Navy Department, after investigating the matter thoroughly and after having soundings made, has made Portsmouth the home port of three battle ships—the Maine, the New Hampshire, and the Wisconsin. The department can not be misinformed as to the situation there.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What does the Senator mean by "home port?"

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the home port for vessels needing repairs—these three battleships.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, it would not be possible to dock more than one of these vessels at one time?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not more than one at the same time. That is all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And if it be true—just assuming that it possibly is true—that a vessel can only go in at slack water, then a vessel might have to wait six hours before it could be taken in there at all?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; it might have to wait six hours.

Mr. HALE. All three of these ships could go in abreast. The Senator from Wisconsin is all wrong about this harbor. Somebody has misinformed him. He has got a lot of figures that some naval officer has given him, but these three ships could go in abreast. It is a wonderful harbor, one of the finest in all the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand, Mr. President, that it is a channel where there is a great depth of water.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I have the floor, I do.

Mr. LODGE. I think I have the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I ask the Senator from Washington to wait a moment.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to be forgotten.

Mr. PILES. I just want to correct an error; that is all.

Mr. LODGE. I stated that the harbor at Puget Sound was deeper.

Mr. PILES. I want simply to correct a statement that has been made. It has been stated by some Senator on the floor that the largest vessel contemplated could not make an entrance to Puget Sound without dredging. I want to say that the entrance to the Puget Sound Navy-Yard has 42 feet at mean low tide and 55½ feet at mean high tide; so that the statement was an error, and whoever made the statement was wrong. The greatest naval vessels of the United States can put their noses, so to speak, right into the dry dock at Puget Sound Navy-Yard; and in place of going in three abreast, they can go in something like ten abreast, and the fleets of the world can lie at anchor in the bay off Puget Sound Navy-Yard.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator from Washington will do me the justice to remember that when I referred to the Portsmouth Navy-Yard, I stated that it had the deepest water, with the exception of Puget Sound. I was careful to say that.

Mr. PILES. I understood the Senator to say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. And we have at Portsmouth almost as much water as there is at Puget Sound, but not quite as much.

Mr. HALE. We have got some very good navy-yards.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I inquire who has the floor, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has the floor. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LODGE. I will yield to the Senator from Wisconsin if he desires to ask any further questions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Since some attention has been directed to Portsmouth, and any question that seems to be raised here with respect to the perfection of that harbor provokes great levity in the Chamber, I want to ask the Senator from New Hampshire or the Senator from Maine if it is not a fact that Admiral Goodrich recommended within the last three months that Portsmouth be abandoned altogether as a harbor, and that no further expenditures be made upon it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I believe Admiral Goodrich did make that absurd recommendation, with several other absurd recommendations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The question of the absurdity of that recommendation may be one to thrash out more completely here than can be done in the closing hour of this legislative session. I was simply seeking to know whether it would be admitted by either of the Senators who are especially concerned in this harbor that any authority could be found on earth questioning the ampleness of the harbor and its being the choicest selection in the whole country. Now, while we are upon that subject——

Mr. LODGE. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator is through with his questions, if he will allow me to proceed, I shall be through in a few moments and will yield the floor to him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. At different times there have been recommendations for abandoning many of the navy-yards. I remember that an eminent Secretary of the Navy from the State of New Hampshire thought it would be wise to close the Boston yard and leave the Portsmouth yard open. I differed with him in that view at the time; but I find that the General Board of the Navy has made the following comments concerning the navy-yard at Boston, showing how easy it is to be mistaken as to the advisability of closing such a yard. It says:

* * * To utilize the present capacity of the navy-yards at * * * Boston for repairs, but that large facilities, in addition to present equipment * * * is not urgent.

The general board also believes it to be good general policy to utilize so far as possible the docking facilities at Portsmouth, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Puget Sound, as well as the docks at Norfolk and San Francisco when completed.

* * * For lack of water-front space at any one yard it has been found necessary, and probably will always be necessary, to divide the fleets into groups, if all the ships of the fleet are to repair at the same time, assigning a group to each of the yards at Portsmouth, N. H., Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Norfolk on the Atlantic coast, and Puget Sound and Mare Island on the Pacific, as home ports for repairs and docking, a plan which has worked well in the past two years when the demands have been by no means light.

That is the report of the general board.

Now, all these yards of which I have been speaking, beginning at Portsmouth and running down the coast, have the necessary water. They have great harbors that must be improved for commercial purposes. They are admitting now to the harbors in Boston and New York certainly vessels of the merchant marine of larger tonnage than the vessels proposed in this bill. The Lusitania and the Mauretania, of the Cunard Line, are 32,000 tons gross. The White Star Line is building two new ships which are to be of 40,000 tons. They expect to get them into the harbor of New York, where the controlling depth to the sea is less than it is at Boston, and very much less than it is at Portsmouth.

It is therefore absurd to suggest that there is not water enough for the utilization of all these yards. We have none too many docks, and that will be demonstrated on the return of the fleet. The figures exhibited by the Senator from Maine, which are, I confess, entirely new to me, contrasting the expense of our yards with those of Great Britain—and Great Britain builds her ships under contract, as we do—I think show that the navy-yards of the United States have not been extravagantly managed, but, on the contrary, have been very economically managed. They are absolutely necessary for the repairs of the navy and to enable us to keep contractors within bounds.

I ask leave to print as a part of my remarks certain memoranda in regard to Boston.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

MEMORANDUM IN RELATION TO THE NAVY-YARD, BOSTON, MASS.

The site now occupied by the Boston Navy-Yard was ceded to the United States by the State of Massachusetts in 1800, the original cession including an area of 65 acres, and the acreage was subsequently increased by purchase of additional territory. Among the principal vessels built there in former years were the following:

Independence, launched June 22, 1814.
Cyane, launched December 2, 1837.
Bainbridge, launched April 26, 1842.
Cumberland, launched May 24, 1842.
Plymouth, launched October 11, 1843.
Vermont, launched September 14, 1848.
Princeton, launched October 29, 1851.
Merrimac, launched June 14, 1855.
Narragansett, launched February 15, 1859.
Wachusett, launched October 10, 1861.
Housatonic, launched November 20, 1861.
Monadnock, launched March 23, 1864.
Guerriere, launched September 9, 1865.
Worcester, launched August 15, 1867.
Vandalia, launched October 23, 1874.

The Constitution was built at the shipyard of Samuel Hart, in Boston, the keel being laid in November, 1794.

Among the vessels also laid down at Boston, but not finished, were the original Virginia, Connecticut, Oregon, and the Pennsylvania. The keels of the last three were laid during the civil war, but the vessels were never completed.

In recent years the U. S. S. Cumberland, a steel sailing vessel, resembling in many respects the original Cumberland of civil-war fame, was built at the navy-yard, Boston.

The Boston Navy-Yard is located in the midst of a large manufacturing district and close to complete labor and material markets. It has good water approaches and needs no further protection than that given the city of Boston. It is in many respects the best location for a navy-yard east of New York. The importance of this yard from the early days is shown by comments of the various Secretaries of the Navy.

In 1876, it appears from the report of the Secretary of the Navy of that year, that by special direction of Congress a board of commissioned officers had been appointed "to examine fully and determine whether any of the navy-yards could be dispensed with," etc.

In the Secretary's report for the year 1877, and referring to the Boston Navy-Yard, appears the expression, "This yard is a very important one."

In 1878 the Secretary said: "It has every facility for the construction and repair of vessels," and so forth; and in 1879, "The great importance of this yard renders it necessary that it should be always kept in good condition."

Congress, in the act of August 5, 1882, directed the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a commission to consider and report "Whether it is advisable to sell any of the navy-yards, and if so, which; and report, also, certain facts and opinions bearing upon the question of sale or retention." This same year the Secretary of the Navy, in recommending a decrease in the number of navy-yards at that time, said: "No advocate of a stronger and better navy urges the construction of many ships or the maintenance of a large fleet."

The Secretary's report for 1883 refers to the report of the Navy-Yard Commission, appointed in accordance with the instructions of Congress, and consisting of Commodore S. B. Luce, Chief Engineer C. H. Loring, and A. B. Mullett, esq., civilian member. This commission made certain recommendations relative to navy-yard organization and closing certain yards, but did not agree as to the Boston yard, the Secretary stating in reference to the report of this commission: "Two think that it should not be used as a construction and repair yard in time of peace, but all agree that the woodwork and sail-maker shops should be continued in operation, and that the yard should not be sold, but kept for use in time of war." The Secretary, in the same report, says, "Of the little more than 30 vessels in commission, only 5 or 6 have required repairs at any one time," and so forth.

By orders of the Secretary this yard was then used as an equipment yard.

The various reports of the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks during this period set forth the general deterioration of the buildings and appliances of the yard.

Later, in 1889, the Secretary of the Navy said: "The only stations now in use as construction yards are Brooklyn, Norfolk, Mare Island, and Portsmouth. The other yards were closed, as far as construction and repair was concerned, by order of the Secretary, June 23, 1883, under the provisions of the act of August 5, 1882."

The Secretary also stated that the Boston yard was "capacious, well located, with building slips, dry docks, etc., harbor a fine one, with deep water," and that the surrounding population afforded an ample supply of good mechanics.

In 1900 the Secretary of the Navy in his annual report says, referring to navy-yards: "The demands upon these yards have largely increased, and in some instances have reached the limit of the capacity of the existing plants. The efficiency of ships afloat must necessarily be dependent, in large measure, upon the promptness and thoroughness with which defects, due to wear and tear, deterioration, or latent imperfections, are remedied, and it is accordingly important that facilities for executing at the several manufacturing yards work required by ships in commission should be made adequate to the increasing demands of the service."

In recent years Boston has again been made a construction and repairing station, in addition to its equipment features, and is possessed of two dry docks, fine piers, good water frontage and approaches, and is well located as regards labor and material markets. Several of the other large navy-yards are so situated that large extensions are impracticable; and it would also be impracticable to extend such yards to such an extent as to accommodate all the repair work of the fleet in time of war. Therefore the only practicable means of having sufficient repairing plants to maintain the fleet under war conditions or in preparation for war is by retaining and developing those navy-yards which are suitably located.

Referring to the Boston Navy-Yard, the Secretary of the Navy in 1877 stated as follows: "So much money has already been expended for this yard, and so essential is it for the maintenance of the navy, that it would be bad economy to permit it to go into decay and the large amount of property accumulated in it to be wasted." The value of the Boston yard has greatly increased since 1877.

The value of the total plant at Boston at the end of the fiscal year 1907, including land, buildings, docks, chattels, and machinery, was $18,863,110.37, made up of—

Realty	$8,583,000.00
Buildings, plant appliances, machinery, power plants, yard improvements, wharves, etc	8,207,393.18
Dry docks	2,072,717.19

In addition to the allotted portions of the routine annual appropriations, such as "General maintenance," "Repair and preservation," and so forth, the following special appropriations have been made for the Boston Navy-Yard since 1883, the year it became temporarily what was then known as a "closed yard:"

1883 to 1886, inclusive: No special appropriation.
1887 to 1897, inclusive:
Wharves, piers, etc	$45,000
Dry-dock alterations, repairs, etc	95,500
General yard improvements—walls, culverts, telephones, water-closets, gates, paving, sewers, fire system, water piping, etc	37,000
Buildings	33,110
Improvement of plant, appliances, tools, machinery, etc	114,000
Electric-lighting plant	21,000
Total	345,610
1898 to 1908, inclusive:
Wharves, piers, etc	250,000
Dry-dock alterations, repairs, etc	41,500
Dry dock, new	1,100,000
General yard improvements—culverts, water-closets, telephones, gates, roads, paving, sewers, fire system, water piping, etc	690,850
Buildings	1,661,000
Improvements of plant, appliances, tools, machinery, etc	942,570
Coal plant	165,000
Dredging	75,000
Power plant, electric plant, heating plant, underground conduit, etc	498,800
Total	5,424,720
Total 1883 to 1908	5,770,330

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few days ago I had printed a chart compiled from data of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Hydrographic Office, showing the depth of water at high and low tide in front of the several navy-yards of the country. I wish to insert it in the RECORD so that Senators can see that there are not only two yards where these large ships can go in without any difficulty, but that there are six or seven harbors where they can enter without any difficulty.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Name.	Established.	Water at yard.
		High water.	Mean low water.
		Feet.	Feet.
Boston	1801	22.1 to 39.6	12.5 to 30
Portsmouth	1800	33.6 to 57.6	25 to 49
New York	1801	26.4 to 34.4	22 to 30
League Island	1868	27.1 to 39.1	21 to 33
Washington	1800	21 to 23	18 to 20
Norfolk	1801	29.7 to 37.7	27 to 35
Charleston	1901	24.1 to 35.1	19 to 30
Pensacola	1826	16.3 to 42.3	15 to 41
Mare Island	1854	28.1 to 36.1, M. H. H. W.	22 to 30, M. of selected L. L. W.
Puget Sound	1891	37.6 to 61.6	24 to 48, Harmonic tide plane.

Mr. GALLINGER. In addition to that, so that Senators who seem to be particularly gunning for Portsmouth may have information, I ask to have inserted some data concerning the Portsmouth yard, which are very brief.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SOME FACTS ABOUT THE PORTSMOUTH NAVY-YARD.

1. No bar at the harbor entrance.

2. A channel 500 to 700 feet wide at the narrowest points, and 1,000 feet and upward at other places, 35 feet deep at low water, direct to the yard and dry dock.

3. Thirty minutes to forty-five minutes slack water at turn of each tide, allowing ample time to steam the 1½ to 2 miles from lower harbor to berths at yard, if slack-water navigation is preferred.

4. Harbor and channel never obstructed by ice. A short distance only from the sea.

5. Harbor well protected by fortifications.

6. A new granite dry dock that will accommodate any battle ship in the navy, and buildings, plant, and equipment ready for any work on the fleet.

7. The battle ship Maine came to the yard recently without the aid of tugs, and with the greatest ease. She was successfully docked, quickly repaired, and departed without the aid of tugs, and without any hitch of any kind.

8. Three battle ships, including the New Hampshire, the largest type in service, are assigned to this yard as their "home port" for docking and overhauling.

9. Ample area for expansion of working plant when required, for recreation spaces for enlisted men, and for isolating men when necessary, such as ships returning from tropical-fever districts, or the case of the naval prisoners during the Spanish war. Some location, not in the heart of a metropolitan district, is required for such purposes.

10. Located in the midst of an intelligent, loyal, and expert mechanical population, within easy reach of the still larger labor markets of a number of cities.

11. The work here has always been of the highest quality. The yard is now competing successfully in the campaign for more economical production of high-standard work.

12. It is stated that $10,000,000 has been spent on this yard. This expenditure is a permanent investment for improvements that will endure, such as the granite dry dock, granite quay walls, commodious fireproof buildings, some grading, improvement of channel at Hendersons Point. Is it proposed to abandon this investment and, in the interest of economy, to duplicate it elsewhere?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I will put in the RECORD either to-morrow or afterwards a fuller comparison between our yards and other yards upon public works. That was the feature to which I was calling attention.

Now, I wish to say before Senators leave—it is now half-past 5, and, of course, it is impossible to finish the bill to-night—that I find on looking it over that we are two days short of what I stated on Thursday. Tuesday of next week is confiscated to the Brownsville inquiry and Saturday to eulogies, several of which have been combined and will take up the day. So we have only eleven or twelve days remaining. I shall not ask for a session to-night, but in order that Senators may be prepared I shall, if we do not finish the bill to-morrow afternoon, ask for a night session to-morrow. I will say to Senators that while I do not expect in any way—and I think I have not to-day in any way sought—to interfere with debate and the questions and answers, we can not get the appropriation bills through by 12 o'clock March 4 unless we have hereafter a good many night sessions; and undoubtedly we will soon have to meet at 11 o'clock.

Of course we may be confronted with some of the appropriation bills going over. If we do that, it will change the whole programme for the special session. If that session is open to business generally and appropriations bills and everything else, instead of getting off, as we hoped, by the middle of June, we will be here until August. I think the Senate generally has the feeling that we will endure some privation and some hardship through the remaining days in order to avoid that, which would be very irksome and burdensome to everybody.

I think there is some other business that Senators desire to have transacted, and I will not ask the Senate to go on further with the appropriation bill this evening, but to-morrow I shall test the sense of the Senate, unless we finish the bill in the afternoon, with respect to an evening session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be temporarily laid aside.

ORGANIZATION OF DISTRICT MILITIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House agreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 21926) for the organization of the militia in the District of Columbia, except amendment No. 79, and agreeing to the same with an amendment, on page 9, line 20, to strike out "eight" and insert "eighteen."

Mr. HEMENWAY. The amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate simply corrects a mistake in the print of the bill. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL PEACE COMMITTEE.

Mr. DANIEL. I am directed by the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19662) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the Foundation for the Promotion of Industrial Peace," to report it favorably without amendment; and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish the Senator from Virginia would explain to me the exact change in the present law.

Mr. DANIEL. I will answer with pleasure. The only changes in the present law are stated in the letter of Secretary Straus, who has been attending to this matter:

The amendment provides that the "Industrial Peace Committee" shall consist of 16 members instead of 9 as now provided, and shall include the 7 trustees created by the act. It is believed that the co-operation of the trustees with the committee appointed by them will place a practical responsibility upon the trustees commensurate with the importance of the trust, and that the unification of the two bodies will best subserve the interests involved.

Upon my own responsibility I have also drafted an amendment to section 3, which does away with the necessity of calling an annual conference of the representatives of capital and labor for the purpose of discussing industrial problems. I am convinced that a compulsory annual meeting between the representatives of capital and labor is not advisable, and that better results will be accomplished by leaving it within the discretion of the committee to call meetings when deemed necessary.

There is nothing in the bill except a convenient rearrangement of some of its provisions. It is some time since the original act passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL COURTS AT SUPERIOR, WIS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 27311) amending chapter 591 of the United States Statutes at Large, Fifty-sixth Congress, approved May 26, 1900, entitled "An act to provide for the holding of a term of the circuit and district courts of the United States at Superior, Wis." It was reported favorably to-day from the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 20, after the word "writs," to strike out "warrants;" in the same line, after the word "processes," to insert "except criminal warrants;" in line 21, after the word "issued," to strike out "by the said courts or the clerks thereof" and insert "out of said courts;" in line 22, before the word "be," to strike out "shall" and insert "may;" and in line 24, before the word "pending," to strike out "or" and insert "and," so as to read:

SEC. 3. All summonses, writs, and processes, except criminal warrants, issued out of said courts at Superior may be made returnable at Superior, and the clerk shall keep in his office the original records of all actions, prosecutions, and special proceedings so commenced and pending therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "therein," in line 24, on page 2, to insert:

Criminal warrants may be returned at any place where the court is held. Whenever warrants shall be returned at any place other than Superior, the clerk of the court where the warrant is returned shall certify the same under the seal of the court, together with the plea and other proceedings had thereon, and the determination of the court upon such plea or proceedings and all papers and orders filed in reference thereto to the clerk of the courts at Superior, and shall charge for the same in his account against the United States. The clerk at Superior shall enter upon his records a minute of the proceedings had upon the return of said warrant and certified as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 11, after the words "grand jury," to insert "or petit jury."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CHARLES H. DUNNING.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 18487) for the relief of Charles H. Dunning.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Charles H. Dunning, late postmaster at Rome, N. Y., $421.21, paid by him in settlement of his accounts with the Government to cover loss sustained by reason of the failure of the Fort Stanwix National Bank, of Rome, N. Y.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADOLPHUS ERWIN WELLS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill (H. R. 10752) to complete the military record of Adolphus Erwin Wells was read the third time and passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

HARRY KIMMELL.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 17214) for the relief of Harry Kimmell, a commander on the retired list of the United States Navy.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the President to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Harry Kimmell, now a commander on the retired list of the United States Navy, a commander on the active list of the navy, to take rank next after Frederick C. Bieg.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MERRITT & CHAPMAN WRECKING COMPANY.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 6935) for the relief of the Merritt & Chapman Wrecking Company.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to the Merritt & Chapman Wrecking Company, of New York City, N. Y., $237.36, in full for damages resulting from injury to its boats and materials and failure to return the same after hire thereof by the War Department for use in laying submarine mines.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDERSONVILLE PRISON LAND, GEORGIA.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6971) authorizing the acceptance by the United States Government from the Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, of a proposed gift of Andersonville Prison Park, in the State of Georgia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The amendments were, in line 5, before the word "gift," to strike out "proposed;" in line 7, before the word "of," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "of Andersonville National Park, in the State of Georgia, consisting;" in line 8, after the word "Cemetery," to insert "in the State of Georgia;" in line 10, after the word "said,' to strike out "park" and insert "land;" and in line 11, after the word "the," to strike out said," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept from the Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, a gift of 88 acres of land, more or less, contiguous to the Andersonville National Cemetery, in the State of Georgia, with all improvements thereon, the details incident to the transfer of said land to be arranged and perfected by the Secretary of War.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FORAKER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the acceptance by the United States Government from the Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, of a gift of Andersonville prison land, in the State of Georgia."

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that the report accompanying the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report submitted by Mr. FORAKER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, on the 8th instant is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs have had under consideration the following bill:

[S. 6971, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

A bill authorizing the acceptance by the United States Government from the Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, of a proposed gift of Andersonville Prison Park, in the State of Georgia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept from the Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, a proposed gift of Andersonville National Park, in the State of Georgia, consisting of 88 acres of land, more or less, contiguous to the Andersonville National Cemetery, with all improvements thereon, the details incident to the transfer of said park to be arranged and perfected by the said Secretary of War.

From the correspondence and papers filed in connection with this bill it appears that the Grand Army of the Republic of Georgia bought the grounds of the Andersonville prison site of the original owner. The tract contained 72½ acres, and the price paid was $1,500. The Grand Army of the Republic of Georgia made improvements the first year costing $1,500, making a total expenditure of $3,000, to which sum the Woman's Relief Corps of Georgia contributed a considerable amount.

Those in Georgia who were interested in the so-called "park" realizing they would be unable to improve and care for it in a proper manner, offered it to the National Woman's Relief Corps as a gift, free of debt. At the Fourteenth Annual Convention of the National Woman's Relief Corps, held in St. Paul, a resolution was passed accepting the property. The titles to it were examined, deeds drawn, executed, and properly recorded, and placed in the hands of the president of the National Woman's Relief Corps. Some time afterwards it was discovered that this organization did not own the northwest corner of the tract which had come into its hands, such corner being located in another country. Negotiations finally resulted in the purchase of 14½ acres necessary to complete the tract.

The National Woman's Relief Corps have since improved the property by inclosing the grounds with a wire fence, building thereon a ten-room cottage, and planting trees, shrubbery, flowers, etc.

The States of Massachusetts, Ohio, Michigan, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin have erected on these grounds monuments dedicated to the memory of the soldiers from these States, respectively, who died in the prison and were buried in Andersonville Cemetery, which is adjacent, being connected by a narrow strip of land. In the excavations for the foundations of these monuments the remains of buried soldiers were found.

The National Woman's Relief Corps is a corporation not for profit, organized under the laws of Ohio for charitable and patriotic purposes, with power to accept and convey title to such property, as shown by the following opinion of Hon. Wade H. Ellis, attorney-general of Ohio:

STATE OF OHIO,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Columbus, Ohio, March 23, 1908.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 14, inclosing a copy of the articles of incorporation of the National Woman's Relief Corps, together with certain letters and documents bearing upon the acquisition by that organization of the site of Andersonville Prison. The papers are referred to me as to the legality of a proposed transfer of this property to the Federal Government.

The corporation is formed not for profit and its objects appear to be charitable and patriotic in nature. The right to dispose of this property stands upon the right to acquire it. If such right exists at all it must be under the first section of the purpose clause which provides, in part, "to assist the Grand Army of the Republic and to perpetuate the memory of their heroic dead."

Assuming the land in question to have been acquired for the purpose of preserving it as a memorial to the Union prisoners who died at Andersonville or as a result of infirmities received while confined in the prison, I believe that the ownership of this tract by the National Woman's Relief Corps is within its corporate power. That being the case, a transfer of the property to the Federal Government, if designed to perpetuate the memorial more effectively than could be done by the corporation itself, would be entirely legal.

I herewith return the papers submitted to me.

Very truly, yours,
WADE H. ELLIS,
Attorney-General.

HON. WALTER D. GUILBERT,
Auditor of State, Columbus, Ohio.

The following is a copy of the articles of incorporation of the Woman's Relief Corps referred to by the attorney-general of Ohio in his foregoing opinion:

ARTICLES OF INCORPORATION.

These articles of incorporation of the National Woman's Relief Corps witnesseth that we, the undersigned, a majority of whom are citizens of the State of Ohio, desiring to form a corporation, not for profit, under the general corporation laws of said State, do hereby certify:

First. The name of said corporation shall be the National Woman's Relief Corps.

Second. Said corporation is to be located and its principal business transacted at the city of Troy, in Miami County, Ohio.

To cherish and emulate the deeds of our army nurses and all loyal women who rendered loving service to our country in her hour of peril.

3. To maintain true allegiance to the United States of America, to inculcate lessons of patriotism and love of country among our children and in the communities in which we live, and encourage the spread of universal liberty and equal rights to all.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OHIO,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Lewis C. Laylin, secretary of state of Ohio, de hereby certify that the foregoing is an exemplified copy, carefully compared by me with the original record now in my official custody as secretary of state, and found to be true and correct, of the articles of incorporation of "The National Woman's Relief Corps," filed in this office on the 3d day of February, A. D. 1904, and recorded in volume 92, page 642, of the Records of Incorporations.

Witness my hand and official seal at Columbus this 3d day of February, A. D. 1904.
[SEAL.] LEWIS C. LAYLIN,
Secretary of State.

In view of the foregoing and because of a belief that these grounds should be under the control and protection of the United States, the Woman's Relief Corps last year authorized its national president, Mrs. Kate E. Jones, to make the following formal tender of them to the Government as a free gift, unencumbered:

HEADQUARTERS WOMAN'S RELIEF CORPS,
OFFICE OF THE NATIONAL PRESIDENT,
Ilion, N. Y., March 27, 1908.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives,
United States Government:

I, Kate E. Jones, national president of the Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, with the consent of the national council of administration, do hereby formally tender to the United States Government the gift of the Andersonville Woman's Relief Corps Park, situated at Andersonville, Ga., a tract of land of 87 acres, with a 10-room cottage thereon, the property of the Woman's Relief Corps, free of all indebtedness.

This act to take effect September 3, 1908.

[SEAL.] Mrs. KATE E. JONES, National President.
ELIZA BROWN DAGGETT, National Secretary.

The acceptance of these lands is therefore believed by your committee to be desirable, but your committee are of the opinion that they should be accepted, not as a park, but simply as lands, so that Congress may be free to make a park of them or deal with them otherwise, as it may hereafter see fit.

Accordingly, the recommendation of your committee is that the bill be amended so as to read as follows and passed:

[S. 6971, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

A bill authorizing the acceptance by the United States Government from the Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, of a proposed gift of Andersonville Prison Park, in the State of Georgia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept from the Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, a gift of 88 acres of land, more or less, contiguous to the Andersonville National Cemetery, in the State of Georgia, with all improvements thereon, the details incident to the transfer of said land to be arranged and perfected by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 8276) for the creation of the police and firemen's relief fund, to provide for the retirement of members of the police and fire departments, to establish a method of procedure for such retirement, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. KITTREDGE. In my opinion, a bill of that importance ought not to be considered at this hour. Therefore I object to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will go over.

UNSURVEYED LANDS OF THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. OWEN. I ask consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 8441) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be surveyed any unsurveyed lands belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS OF CAREY ACT.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 26216) to extend the provisions of section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes," approved August 18, 1894, to the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will call attention to the fact that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] left a memorandum wishing to be notified before this bill is acted on.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from South Carolina has withdrawn all objections to it, I am advised.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WARREN C. BEACH.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 4029) to appoint Warren C. Beach a captain in the army and place him on the retired list.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will go over.

ATCHISON, TOPEKA AND SANTA FE RAILROAD.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to take up the joint resolution (S. R. 127) authorizing an extension of the tracks of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad on the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DUPLICATION OF POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT CHECKS.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 25805) to reenact and to amend sections 3646 and 3647 of the Revised Statutes.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend the sections so as to read:

SEC. 3646. Whenever any original disbursing officer's check is lost, stolen, or destroyed, the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize the officer issuing the same, after the expiration of six months and within three years from the date of such disbursing officer's check, to issue a duplicate thereof upon the execution of such bond to indemnify the United States as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That when such original disbursing officer's check does not exceed in amount the sum of $50 the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize the issuance of a duplicate at any time after the expiration of thirty days and within three years from the date of such disbursing officer's check: Provided further, That whenever any original check or warrant of the Post-Office Department has been lost, stolen, or destroyed the Postmaster-General may authorize the issuance of a duplicate thereof, at any time within three years from the date of such original check or warrant, upon the execution by the owner thereof of such bond of indemnity as the Postmaster-General may prescribe: And provided further, That when such original check or warrant does not exceed in amount the sum of $50 and the payee or owner is, at the date of the application, an officer or employee in the service of the Post-Office Department, whether by contract, designation, or appointment, the Postmaster-General may, in lieu of an indemnity bond, authorize the issuance of a duplicate check or warrant upon such an affidavit as he may prescribe, to be made before any postmaster by the payee or owner of an original check or warrant.

SEC. 3647. In case the disbursing officer or agent by whom such lost, destroyed, or stolen original check was issued is dead or no longer in the service of the United States it shall be the duty of the proper accounting officer, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, to state an account in favor of the owner of such original check for the amount thereof and to charge such amount to the account of such officer or agent: Provided, That in case a check drawn by any officer or agent of the Post-Office Department is lost, stolen, or destroyed a duplicate thereof may be issued under regulations prescribed by the Postmaster-General, as set forth in section 3646.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPUTY MARSHALS.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16274) to amend section 10 of chapter 252, volume 29, of Public Statutes at Large.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the bill may be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. The bill simply strikes out "two" and inserts "three," allowing $1 a day additional. There is nothing else in the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 10 of chapter 252, volume 29, Public Statutes at Large, by striking out, in the twelfth line of the section, the word "two" and inserting in place thereof the word "three," so as to read:

SEC. 10. That when in the opinion of the Attorney-General the public interest requires it, he may, on the recommendation of the marshal, which recommendation shall state the facts as distinguished from conclusions, showing necessity for the same, allow the marshals to employ necessary office deputies and clerical assistance, upon salaries to be fixed by the Attorney-General, from time to time, and paid as hereinafter provided. When any of such office deputies is engaged in the service of any writ, process, subpœno, or other order of the court, or when necessarily absent from the place of his regular employment, on official business, he shall be allowed his actual traveling expenses only, and his necessary and actual expenses for lodging and subsistence, not to exceed $3 per day, and the necessary actual expenses in transporting prisoners, including necessary guard hire; and he shall make and render accounts thereof as hereinafter provided.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MICHAEL FITZ SIMMONS.

Mr. FORAKER. I move that the bill (S. 8487) to correct the military record of Michael Fitz Simmons, deceased, reported heretofore favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs, be recommitted to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 10, before the word "dollars," to strike out 'twenty-five" and insert "ten."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. DANIEL. Does the bill propose to make it a jail penalty to keep a book overtime out of the library?

Mr. BURKETT. If the Senator will listen he will find that that is stricken out by an amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. I did not hear the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

Mr. DANIEL. Let the bill be read as it is proposed to amend it.

The SECRETARY. In line 10, after the word "dollars," strike out "or by imprisonment for not less than one month or more than six months," so that, if amended, the bill will read:

"SEC. 849a. Whoever willfully detains any book, newspaper, magazine, pamphlet, manuscript, or other property belonging to or in the custody or control of the Library of Congress or any public or incorporated library in the District of Columbia for thirty days after notice in writing to return the same, such notice to contain a copy of this section, and to be given after the expiration of the time which, by the rules of such library, such book or other property may be kept, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10. Prosecutions under this section shall be brought in the name of the District of Columbia by information filed by the corporation counsel or one of his assistants: Provided, That the penalties provided by this section shall be in addition to any penalties lawfully imposed by the trustees of any public or incorporated library in the District of Columbia, and shall be applicable when the offense is not otherwise punishable by some statute of the United States."

Mr. BACON. To what libraries does the bill refer?

Mr. BURKETT. The District library, and——

Mr. OVERMAN. The Congressional Library.

Mr. BACON. If it applies to the Congressional Library I am absolutely opposed to it.

Mr. KEAN. I understand there is a report accompanying the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill go over so that we may examine it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over.

OSAGE ENROLLMENT.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to call up the joint resolution (S. R. 70) for the enrollment of certain persons as members of the Osage tribe of Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] I know desires to be present when the joint resolution is considered.

Mr. OWEN. It is merely to send to the Court of Claims the claims of certain persons, 33 or 34, who desire to be enrolled.

Mr. KEAN. Let it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie over.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25552) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania, by the Liberty Bridge Company," approved March 2, 1907.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded with its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE DANIEL L. D. GRANGER.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. DANIEL L. D. GRANGER, late a Representative from the State of Rhode Island, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to.

Thereupon the Senate (at 6 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 16, 1909, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 15, 1909.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, look down, we beseech Thee, upon us with compassion and forgive our sins as individuals and as a Nation, and inspire in us a greater love and admiration for those things which make for righteousness in the soul, that we may go forward with the work which Thou hast given us to do with a clear vision, pure conscience, and high ideals that at last we may merit the "Well done, good and faithful servant."

We are reminded by the death of one of the Members of this House of the uncertainty of life, that in the midst of life there is death. Help us, our Heavenly Father, to be prepared for the change which will bring us into a larger life. Comfort, we pray Thee, the family and friends of the deceased, and guide us all to the larger faith in Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SALARY OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 9295, and that the rules be suspended and that the same be passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia moves that the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 9295, that the rules be suspended and that the same be passed. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 9295) in relation to the salary of the Secretary of State.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1907, so far as the same relates to the annual compensation of the Secretary of State, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. RUCKER. I demand a second.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I demand a second.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. RUCKER. Pending that request, I ask unanimous consent that the time of debate be extended to two hours on a side.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I am compelled, Mr. Speaker, to object to that; I would like to give what time is desired for debate, but there are other matters pressing.

Mr. RUCKER. In view of the importance of this matter, I will ask if we can not agree on one hour on a side for debate?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. If I did not make objection others would, and I am constrained to object.

Mr. LASSITER. I join in the request of the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that a second be considered as ordered?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I desire to make a request that unanimous consent be given.

The SPEAKER. But the first thing is to see whether this matter is to be voted upon at all.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] will take their places as tellers. All those in favor of ordering a second will pass between the tellers.

The House divided and the tellers reported that there were 116 ayes and 60 noes.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 116 and the noes are 60, and a second is ordered. The gentleman from West Virginia is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Texas to twenty minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Texas because he demanded a second.

Mr. RUCKER. The Speaker is wrong; I demanded a second.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. That is what the Speaker is there for.

The SPEAKER. The Chair again states that he was looking at the gentleman from Missouri and failed to hear him demand a second, but he did hear the gentleman from Texas. So the Chair does not charge himself with any laches.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on account of a misunderstanding I desire the gentleman from Missouri to have the control of the twenty minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent for an hour's debate on each side of this proposition. If you gentleman have enough votes over there to pass the bill you can pass it and debate will not do any particular harm.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for one hour's debate on each side.

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that other matters are pressing the House to-day and we will hardly get through; and in view of the fact that we have wasted fifteen minutes in ordering a second I shall have to object to any extension of debate.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I should like to submit a request for unanimous consent that would obviate the objection that the gentleman from New York made. I ask unanimous consent that we have an evening session, beginning this evening at 8 o'clock and continuing until 11 o'clock, which will give us an hour and a half on each side.

Mr. PAYNE. The regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration, and which has just been read at the Clerk's desk, in and of itself in nowise offends against any provision of the Constitution. No one has said—and, I take it, no one will contend—that the enactment of this particular measure will be in violation of the organic law, but the most that is urged against it is that it is an attempt to avoid an alleged ineligibility which may arise hereafter in a possible case. This bill simply seeks (1) to repeal that part of the act of June 30, 1908, which relates to the annual compensation of the Secretary of State and fixes this compensation at the rate of $8,000 per annum, which was the compensation named in the former statute covering the subject; (2) to provide that there shall be no emoluments attached to the office of Secretary of State other than those in force on the 1st day of May, 1904; (3) and stipulates that the pending measure, if enacted, shall be in force from and after March 4 next. It seems to me too plain for argument, and therefore a waste of time, to say that there can be no constitutional obstacle to the passage of this bill.

Undoubtedly this is true, unless we look beyond the terms of this measure and consider as inseparably related to it the possibility of the appointment of Senator KNOX to the office of Secretary of State. If we were permitted to follow the example of a good lawyer before a court, we would confine ourselves to the case at bar, to the particular question before the tribunal, rather than seek for a moot case, and discuss a question that might arise before some other tribunal in some other case at some future time.

Mr. Speaker, in considering the pending measure I believe we have nothing to do with what may be the question presented to the Senate in the near future upon the happening of a possible contingency. To put it plainer, I do not believe that in considering the measure now before the House we have anything to do with a decision of the question which will be presented to the Senate when that body sits as a part of the appointing power to consider the nomination of Senator KNOX as Secretary of State, which nomination is now probable, with every prospect of being made a certainty on the 4th of next month.

I have no objection to urge against this bill which reduces the salary of the Secretary of State. By its very terms it does not relate to any other matter. If I had the opportunity I would vote to reduce the salary of every other Cabinet officer to $8,000. I do not believe that any man has ever accepted a place in any presidential cabinet on account of any salary inducement. It seems to me that $8,000 per annum is enough salary for such a position. Therefore, because this bill does not violate any provision of the Constitution and does reduce the salary of the Secretary of State, I shall vote for it.

I concede, Mr. Speaker, that many of my associates here, whose opinions I value highly, do not agree with the line of argument that I have pursued; so, out of deference to them and for the sake of further argument, I shall consider as best I can in the brief time allowed me the question of the eligibility of Senator KNOX for the portfolio of Secretary of State in the Cabinet of the incoming President.

The second paragraph of section 6 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States is in the following language:

> No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office.

To correctly understand any provision of law it is essential to know the good which it is intended to provide and the evil which it is intended to prevent. The rule is stated by an eminent authority to be as follows:

> The mischief intended to be removed or suppressed or the cause or necessity of any kind which induced the enactment of a law are important factors to be considered in its construction. The purpose for which the law was enacted is a matter of prime importance in arriving at a correct interpretation of its terms.

Again Judge Story says:

> The reason and spirit of the law, or the causes which led to its enactment, are often the best exponents of the words, and limit their application.

And again he says:

> The rules then adopted are, to construe the words according to the subject-matter, in such a case as to produce a reasonable effect, and with reference to the circumstances of the particular transaction. Light may also be obtained in such cases from contemporary facts or expositons; from antecedent mischiefs, from known habits, manners, and institutions; and from other sources almost innumerable, which may justly affect the judgment in drawing a fit conclusion in the particular case. (Story on Const., vol. 1, pp. 305–307.)

These rules apply in the construction of any part of a constitution as well as they do in the construction of a statute. A reference to the debates in the convention which framed our Constitution will reveal the fact that there was a twofold purpose in rendering Senators and Representatives ineligible to offices created, or the emoluments of which were increased during the time for which they were elected. It is worthy of note that when this provision was under discussion in that convention, it was attempted to make the bar against Senators and Representatives perpetual, and that this was defeated. This provision was designed in the first place to protect the people from such Senators and Representatives who might be willing to create offices or increase salaries in order that they might enjoy them; and, in the second place, it was designed to remove Congress as far as possible from the influence which such appointments might give the executive over the legislative branch of the Government. If the object was to prevent Senators and Representatives from increasing the salaries of offices and then becoming the beneficiaries of such increase by executive appointment, it obviously follows that the repeal of the law which increased the salary of the Secretary of State would remove the case of Senator KNOX from the reason of the rule, and I think it manifest that it would also remove his case from the operation of the rule.

There can be no dispute that, by repealing the law which increased the salary and restoring the old salary, Senator KNOX, as Secretary of State, would not be benefited by the law passed while he was a Member of the Senate; and therefore the reason which prompted the framers of the Constitution to adopt that provision rendering Senators and Representatives ineligible to certain offices pointed out in the provision which I have read would not longer be applicable. The maxim that "When the reason ceases the rule itself ceases" is not of universal application, and it must be conceded that no matter what the reason of the rule may be, if the rule itself still applies to a given case, then the rule must be followed. Those who contend that the repeal of the law increasing the salary of the Secretary of State will not render Senator KNOX eligible base their contention on the clause which declares, "or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time." Reading that language in the light of the purpose which it was intended to serve, it seems plain to me that it contemplates a continuing condition, and applies, therefore, in a case only where the officer would enjoy the increased emoluments. In the event of the enactment of this bill and the appointment of Senator KNOX he will not "be appointed to any civil office * * * the emoluments whereof shall have been increased." This bill does not attempt to repeal a fact, as is tritely stated, but it seeks to repeal a condition created by a legislative enactment, and it is not to be denied that if Congress has created it can remove the condition. The power to create carries with it the power to destroy.

I venture the opinion that this provision was not intended to apply to a case where an act was passed by Congress, and afterwards, for any reason, repealed, thus restoring the old status. This view is sustained by the rule of construction, that when a statute has been repealed it is the same as to future consequence as if it had never been enacted, unless in the repealing act there is some saving clause.

It is a well-known doctrine applied in construing penal statutes, that if a statute denouncing a given act as a crime has been repealed there would be no warrant or authority for the prosecution of a person for the offense denounced by that statute, even though the offense was committed before the statute was repealed. The prosecution in such a case could not proceed except under the law existing at the time of the trial.

"The general rule is that when an act of the legislature is repealed without a saving clause it is considered, except as to transactions past and closed, as though it had never existed." (Section 282 (162), Lewis Sutherland, Statutory Construction and cases cited.)

"The repeal or expiration of a statute imposing a penalty or forfeiture will prevent any prosecution, trial, or judgment for any offense committed against it while it was in force, unless the contrary is provided in the same or some other existing statute. * * *

"There can be no legal conviction for an offense unless the act be contrary to law at the time it is committed; nor can there be judgment unless the law is in force at the time of the indictment and judgment."

Section 286 (166), Lewis Sutherland, Statutory Construction and cases cited.

If this be the true rule, then we may say that, for a stronger reason, we must conclude, that in testing the right to an office, the law as it exists when the test comes ought to govern.

We speak of this question as a constitutional disqualification, but it must be remembered that the Constitution does not prohibit, in a case like that under consideration, proprio vigore, that there must be some statute enacted before the constitutional disqualification can attach; and it seems to me that, when called upon to decide the question of eligibility vel non, the decision must be made under the Constitution and upon the statutory law existing at the time of the decision. Ineligibility is made up of the constitutional provision and a statutory enactment. If the statute has been repealed before the question of ineligibility arises, there is then no law to which the constitutional provision can be applied.

On account of his high character, eminent ability, and long and successful experience in public life, Senator KNOX will doubtless be nominated by the President to the Senate on March 4 next for Secretary of State. There will then be no existing statute increasing the emoluments of that office enacted while he was a Senator, and I doubt not that the Senate will confirm him. That great body is fully capable of interpreting any provision of the Constitution. Perhaps it is not too much to say that the interpretation of this provision of the Constitution in such a case is confided to the Senate as a part of the appointing power. In my judgment, that tribunal will not "stick in the bark" and say that there was at one time a statute increasing the emoluments of the Secretary of State, enacted while Mr. KNOX was a Senator, but will go deeper and put their decision upon the ground that, on the 4th of March next, there is no statute increasing the emoluments of the office of Secretary of State, enacted during the time for which Senator KNOX was elected, and therefore no constitutional disqualification arises.

It is evident, and it is complimentary to that distinguished gentleman, that when he was selected, conceding that he has been selected, by Mr. Taft as the ranking member of his official family, the matter of salary was not thought of by him, and therefore this question as to his eligibility never occurred to him. Had the salary been any inducement to him the question discussed here to-day would naturally have presented itself for his learned consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would vote for this bill to cut down the salary of the Secretary of State if that were the whole of it; but we all know that this bill is an attempt to make a man eligible as Secretary of State who is ineligible under the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] This bill is simply an effort to override the Constitution by statute. We are asked to stultify ourselves, for that is exactly what it amounts to, for fear that we will be personæ non gratæ at the White House. [Applause.]

Paragraph 2 of section 6 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States reads, in part, as follows:

> No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

There is, there can be, no dispute about the facts in this case. Senator KNOX was elected for a term beginning March 4, 1905, and ending March 3, 1911. He began serving that term March 4, 1905, and has been serving it ever since. Some two years ago, while he was serving that senatorial term, the salaries of all Cabinet officers, including that of Secretary of State, were increased from $8,000 to $12,000. The fact that he voted for the increase has nothing to do with it. If he had voted against it or had not voted at all, would have been all the same.

The act which makes Senator KNOX ineligible to Judge Taft's Cabinet prior to March 4, 1911, when Senator KNOX's present term expires, is an accomplished fact, and all the statutes that this Congress could pass between now and the 4th of March next, if it did not do anything else but pass statutes on that subject, would not make him eligible. It can not be done. Even if the Congress had repealed the law increasing cabinet salaries in fifteen minutes after the President signed it, Senator KNOX would still be barred. The only way to qualify him is to repeal that clause of the Constitution.

Certain newspapers have wanted to know of me whether this is a political question. I have said "No." I say now that it is not a political question. It is a question of the construction of the Constitution. It is a question of understanding plain English, and the fathers who made the Constitution were wise in putting this provision into the Constitution. They were wise then, and it would be the part of wisdom now, if it was not in the Constitution, to put it in. I do not care what the editors say about the idiocy of the fathers of the Constitution, or what they say about the corruption of that time being so great that they had to put this provision in to restrain that generation. It is in there and we can not take it out. It is right that it should be in there, and for one I would not stultify myself if I knew that we would not have any Secretary of State during the next two years. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE].

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, in this case we have no reason, no right, to refer to the constitutional convention and what occurred there, because the provisions of the Constitution in question are plain, they are emphatic, they are unequivocal. The salary of the Secretary of State has been increased. The increased salary has been received for two years. The constitutional prohibition is complete. Mr. Speaker, what attitude would we be in here if we were considering the passage of a statute like this?

> Be it enacted, etc., That any Senator or Representative may, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during the time for which he was elected: Provided, however, That such Senator or Representative shall not receive the increased salary, but shall only receive such salary as was fixed by law before the said increase.

What would we be attempting to do? To amend the Constitution of the United States by legislative enactment, and that is the purpose of this bill. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how others feel, but for myself I will forever feel humiliated if this Congress in this way deliberately passes this act to override the Constitution of the United States. I believe it not only violates the letter of the Constitution, but it violates the spirit of the Constitution. Are we going to say that the United States Senators or Members of the House may engage in these evil machinations and schemes, in these designs which always involve the increase of other salaries, and then pass a bill like this, temporarily reducing the salary, as an avenue of escape? This is not a question of reducing a salary, and everybody here knows it. If the question were upon its merits of reducing the salary of the Secretary of State, I believe that there would not be 10 per cent of the Members of this House who would vote to reduce the salary of the Secretary of State from $12,000 to $8,000. I myself would vote to-morrow to restore this salary to $12,000. No; it is not a question of reducing a salary, and we can not shield ourselves behind that proposition. Any Senator or Member would know, if appointed under such circumstances, that his influence within his party, if it is strong enough to enable him to be appointed Secretary of State, would be strong enough to have this salary restored. It is true the bill says that no future Congress shall restore this salary. This is only another absurdity of this bill. We can not control future Congresses. Absurdities accumulate in this bill. The salary of the Secretary of State is too low now, and that is what nearly all of us believe. You are voting upon this bill upon the other proposition, and not upon the merits of the proposition incorporated in the bill. I do not charge that anything of evil entered into the raising of the Secretary of State's salary. I do not believe that such was the case, but I say all the possible mischief that the Constitution undertakes to protect the country from lives in this act. It is a violation of both the letter and the spirit of this provision of the Constitution. Mr. Speaker, when the temperance people come here for legislation, they are told the Constitution is in their way; when labor demands legislation, its representatives are told the Constitution is in their way. Let us live up to the Constitution. If it applies to one let it apply to all. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. GILLESPIE was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER.]

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I find the provision of the Constitution as plain as its intent. The Constitution is dealing with an appointment. It deals with an office that shall exist at the time of the appointment. It asks, first, whether that office so then existing was created during the term of the Senator or Representative. It deals with emoluments—that is, benefits, gain, or advantage—existing at the time of the appointment, and it asks, second, whether those emoluments include any increase made during the term of the legislator. The words are:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created—and which must therefore then exist—or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

The wording is future—"shall have been increased." They would have said, "had been increased" if they had meant to cover past emoluments.

[Here the hammer fell.]

By unanimous consent Mr. PARKER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and under such leave Mr. PARKER submits the following:

The section is not dealing with emoluments that had been increased and then diminished, or with an office that had been created and then abolished, but with an existing office that "shall have been created," and with emoluments that "shall have been increased." The provision relates to the time of appointment, and therefore with advantage or emolument to be received, and not with past provisions which have no force at the time of the appointment. It submits a practical question, that the Senator or Representative during his term shall take no advantage or emolument from legislation. The provision accurately covers what was intended—the prevention of such personal advantage during the term of service for which the Representative or Senator has been chosen. It will not be twisted by construction out of this intent so as to prevent appointment if the emoluments of former tenants of the office had been increased by legislation afterwards repealed.

The provision does not deal with past offices or past emoluments, but with those still existing at the time of appointment. It does not deal with what other officeholders have received, but with what the legislator who is appointed is to receive. It is a practical provision. Its intent is plain, and I believe it to be plainly expressed; if there be any doubt, it will be so construed as only to carry out that intent, and not to bar good men from the service of their country except when their own legislation has created emoluments which by such appointment would go to them.

Every rule of reasonable construction should apply. Courts consider the old law, the mischief, and the remedy, in order "so to construe the act as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy." In such construction they even disregard the words of a statute in order to attain this result only. A statute declaring leases made by a bishop to be void if made for more than three lives was held to be made for the benefit of the successor, and therefore such a lease was held good during the life of the bishop and only void thereafter.

The Nation can not rightly be barred from the aid of its greatest men. The Constitution does not bar any man, Senator or Representative, from serving his country, except to exclude him from being appointed to an office which brings increased emoluments. This provision if at all doubtful would be limited so as to go no further than the evil intended to be met. But it is plain on its face. The single sentence relates to an appointment to an office existing then and emoluments existing then that may have been created or increased, and to these only.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LASSITER].

Mr. LASSITER. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that it would have been the pleasure of this House to extend the time for debate upon this important question. I shall not undertake in the brief time allotted me to discuss at any length the constitutional question involved in the passage of this act or in any subsequent questions which may grow out of the action to-day of this House. I have listened with great pleasure to my friend, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], and I would be glad to adopt as my sentiments upon the construction of the Constitution of the United States the handsome argument which he has made before the House to-day. I yield to no man, Mr. Speaker, in my reverence for the Constitution of the United States. I believe, however, that if we are to maintain the Constitution in its strength and in that regard in the hearts of the people which it ought to have, it ought to be construed in accordance with its manifest spirit and not in unillumined literalness.

I was glad to hear the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] say that this was not a party question. It ought not to be decided by a party vote. If it is to be decided by a party vote, every gentleman on this side of the Chamber should vote for the passage of this act.

If gentlemen on this side believe that it is the intention of Mr. Taft to perform a Cæsarean section upon the Constitution to bring the Senator from Pennsylvania into his Cabinet; if they believe that they can convince the courts or the country that the first act of the new administration is in violation of the Constitution, it might be strategical to invite our political opponents into such a situation. There is no constitutional question before the House at this moment, nor will we ever be the tribunal to pass upon the constitutionality of what may indirectly come from the passage of this bill. It seems to me that the real question involved in this discussion is, Shall the Democrats undertake to interfere in the formation of Mr. Taft's Cabinet? For one, I shall not stand for mere obstruction. I shall be glad to accord to the Executive, one of the coordinate branches of the Government, such consideration as I constitutionally may in a matter of grave import to the new administration. If this act shall be passed, there will be no impediment. I do not believe that it can be maintained that under the sixth section of the Constitution Congress can create a status for an individual which, in such a case as this, a subsequent act of Congress can not annul.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I propose to close debate on this side in one speech, and I therefore ask the gentleman from Missouri to exhaust some of his time.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, in voicing my opposition to the pending measure I confess to some embarrassment. We on this side of the aisle, and I believe the entire country, hailed with delight the newspaper announcement that the President-elect had tendered a prominent place in his Cabinet to that distinguished citizen of Pennsylvania, Senator KNOX. We recognize in him all the eminent qualifications which fit and prepare him for that high station and which would enable him to discharge its duties with credit to himself and with honor to his country. The pending measure, Mr. Speaker, is harmless and innocent on its face, but let me say to gentlemen who have just discussed the pending question that they can not hide behind the provisions of this bill, because I charge that every man here knows that the purpose of this legislation is not to reduce a salary which is supposed to be too high. The real and only purpose of this legislation is to suspend the Constitution in mid-air, to rend, annul, and destroy it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We learn through the press that the President-elect has wired the Speaker, has wired the floor leader of the House and distinguished Members of the other body to rush this measure through to its enactment. Why this great anxiety? Is it true, can it possibly be true that in the great political party which has already dominated the affairs of this Nation far too long that only one man can be found who is mentally qualified and fitted for that high position, and that that one is barred by the Constitution of the United States?

Gentlemen declaim eloquently in behalf of so construing the Constitution as to preserve its spirit. The provisions we are now considering need no hairsplitting discriminations in their constructions. The language is so clear and unambiguous that it yields to but one construction—only one.

The second paragraph of section 6 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time, etc.

Senator KNOX was elected to the Senate of the United States for a term of six years beginning March 4, 1905, and has been a distinguished Member of that body since that date. His term as a Senator of the State of Pennsylvania will not expire until March 4, 1911, unless he resigns. On the 26th day of February, 1907, the salary of the office of Secretary of State, to which office current report advises us the President-elect desires to appoint Senator KNOX, was increased from $8,000 to $12,000 per annum. The act granting this increase of salary has been in full force and operation nearly two years, and the present incumbent of the office has enjoyed this increase of salary.

The constitutional inhibition is complete, and the country knows, every Member of Congress must know, the very necessity of this legislation proclaims that fact that to-day Senator KNOX is ineligible to the Cabinet office which it is so earnestly desired he shall hold. By the enactment of this measure, we attempt to make him eligible.

Mr. Speaker, I, with all of my colleagues here, stood before that desk with my hand raised aloft and solemnly swore to support the Constitution of the United States. This bill in its incipiency and in its enactment has for its sole purpose the rending and destruction of that instrument. Gentlemen can deceive nobody by it. The country will know, every man here knows and must know that in casting a vote to enact this legislation his purpose is to evade and avoid the plain, unquestioned, unequivocable language of the Constitution. For one, I will not stultify myself to gratify the desires of the President-elect. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and in that connection I would also ask that all gentlemen who desire to speak on this question may have five days to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to my colleague on the committee, Mr. HACKETT, of North Carolina.

Mr. HACKETT. Mr. Speaker, if we are to consider the bill to reduce the salary of the Secretary of State in the light of what appears on the face of it and not in the light of what is its plain purpose and intent—even then I am opposed to it. I am opposed to reducing the salary of any member of the Cabinet, for it is evident to anyone who has lived in Washington and is acquainted with the social and official duties incumbent upon the occupants of these positions, that a salary of $12,000 a year is not too high. I am opposed to cheap men in high official life. It has been suggested that Senator KNOX, who has been tendered the appointment of Secretary of State by President-elect Taft, and for whose relief the bill under consideration is intended, does not need the salary in order to maintain the social and official dignity of the position. How much more reason why it should not be reduced, because we know not when the time may come that some man preeminently fitted may need it. The greatest intellects and wisest statesmen in the history of our country have not been the men of greatest wealth, and I have seen the evil of fixing salaries so low that we can not command men of greatest ability, probity, and intelligence for positions of highest importance, unless these men are blessed with wealth sufficient to maintain the dignity and fill the social requirements of the respective offices, without regard to the salary attached.

Then, too, do we not stultify ourselves by reducing the salary of the premier of the Cabinet far below that of the members of less dignity and importance, and even that of his first assistant. But, Mr. Speaker, the real question involved in this measure is one of constitutional qualification.

Paragraph 2, section 6, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office.

Under this constitutional provision it is admitted by all that at present Senator KNOX is disqualified for a Cabinet position.

What disqualifies him? The Constitution.

When did that disqualification attach to him? When the act was passed increasing the salary.

When and how alone could Congress remove that disqualification? By a reconsideration, at the proper time, of the vote by which the salary was raised and an adverse vote on the proposition to raise it under such reconsideration.

That time has passed. Another session has been entered upon and almost ended, and to my mind there is nothing clearer than the fact that the constitutional inhibition having once attached to the person of Senator KNOX or any other individual, and the time for reconsideration of the act which caused it to attach having forever passed away, the only constitutional remedy for his ineligibility is by constitutional amendment, and that can not be made by congressional enactment.

It is argued by the advocates of this measure that we should regard the spirit of the Constitution and the intent of its framers and not the letter, and that the spirit and intent are that no Senator or Representative shall fill a new office created, or one the emoluments of which have been increased, during the term for which he was elected, in order to take away the temptation from Congressmen to create new offices or increase emoluments of those in existence with the hope of afterwards filling them.

There are two inducements to hold public office, the honor and the salary. The rich man desires the honor and cares little for the salary. The poor man, though he be peerless in intellect, patriotism, and statecraft, equally desires the honor, but can not afford to accept it without the salary. If it be reprehensible and contrary to the spirit of the Constitution to increase the salary in order that any poor Senator or Representative might accept the honor of high official position, is it not equally reprehensible to decrease the salary in order that one single individual Senator or Representative whose wealth enables him to disregard the salary might accept the honor?

I know that it is not fashionable at this day and time to proclaim too strict adherence to the fundamental law of the land. However, at the risk of being held unfashionable, I can conceive of no greater truth than is contained in a clause of the constitution of North Carolina, that "Frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is necessary to preserve unto us the blessings of liberty;" and I believe by a stricter adherence alone to the "Old Landmarks" may we hope for the perpetuity of our free institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], who opened the debate and favors the bill, is both ingenious and candid in his presentation of the question.

He is ingenious in beginning his argument by calling attention to the fact that no gentleman can base his opposition to the pending measure upon constitutional objections to the Senate bill itself, because everyone must readily concede that Congress has the undoubted power to either increase or decrease the salary of the Secretary of State. The gentleman is not willing, however, to maintain a disingenuous position, so he candidly concedes that the question that is really behind the measure, and from which the motive for its passage springs, is not economy, but an attempt to so modify existing law as to render it possible for the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] to accept the high office of Secretary of State in the Cabinet of our incoming President, for which distinguished honor it is authoritatively stated that he has been selected.

Let me say, before I enter into the argument I wish to make, that I have no wish to annoy or embarrass our incoming President, or his administration, particularly with reference to the selection of a Cabinet.

The rules of propriety and good taste would forbid that such a course should be adopted by any member of the opposing party, save upon the most important grounds and for the gravest reasons. Besides, it happens, in this particular matter, that few Members of this body more freely concede and more sincerely admire the great ability of Senator KNOX as a lawyer and as a statesman than I. I believe that he would make a great Secretary of State, and I regret that constitutional objections, as I understand the question, forbid it.

In 1904 Mr. KNOX was elected by the legislature of Pennsylvania to be United States Senator from Pennsylvania for the term beginning March 4, 1905, and ending March 4, 1911. He accepted the office, and from March 4, 1905, up to the present moment has been engaged in the performance of its duties. By the act of February 26, 1907, during the term for which Mr. KNOX was elected Senator, and while he was actually serving as such, Congress increased the salary of the Secretary of State from $8,000 to $12,000 per annum.

Paragraph 2, section 6, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States provides:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time, etc.

Now, on February 26, 1907, "during the time for which" Mr. KNOX was "elected" Senator, the "emoluments" of the office of Secretary of State were increased. So it appears, from the plain words of the Constitution itself, that on February 26, 1907, Mr. KNOX became constitutionally ineligible to appointment as Secretary of State, and that such ineligibility, in the very words of the Constitution itself, continued "during the time for which he was elected" Senator, to wit, up to March 4, 1911. It seems to me that the question is so simple that to merely state it in the very words of the Constitution is all that is required to carry conviction. But able lawyers in the House and elsewhere have either intentionally or unintentionally sought to complicate the question and to muddy the waters by an entirely irrelevant and wholly useless discussion of the "meaning" of this paragraph of the Constitution, the evil it sought to remedy, and the motives that actuated its framers.

No gentleman on this floor, no lawyer here or elsewhere, is better acquainted than I am with the well-settled doctrine that in construing organic law, or statutory law, either for that matter, all of these matters ought to be taken into consideration, under some circumstances, so that the law may be properly understood; but, until the discussion over this bill and the question behind it arose, I never heard of a lawyer of respectable ability, anywhere, seriously contending that reference ought to be made to these sources of information, to these rules of construction, unless the language to be construed is of doubtful meaning or uncertain significance. That this doctrine of construction, sound enough and wise enough when applicable, should first be distorted and then invoked in order to create a doubt where none exists and to afford an opportunity to evade by "construction" constitutional language so plain that it speaks for itself, says what it means, and means what it says is equally shocking to my judgment as a lawyer and my common sense as a man. I do not believe that either lawyer or layman can accept such a doctrine.

Under the Constitution of the United States Senator KNOX is now ineligible to hold the office of Secretary of State, and will be until March 4, 1911, and no act of Congress, and no number of acts of Congress, can remove the constitutional bar which attached to him on the 26th day of February, 1907, when the Congress of which he was a Member, during the term for which he was elected, increased the salary of the Secretary of State.

The constitutional provision in question does not mean, as our opponents in this debate would have the House and the country believe, that no Member of Congress shall be appointed to an office the salary of which is higher at the time of such appointment than it was when his congressional service began. If it had meant that, it would have been a very simple matter to have said just that, and in fewer words than were employed in the provision that was adopted.

But the gentlemen who favor this bill insist that if Senator KNOX does not receive as Secretary of State greater compensation than attached to that office when his term as Senator began the "spirit" of the Constitution will have been complied with. Let us examine this argument for just a moment. Suppose Mr. KNOX becomes Secretary of State, and suppose at some time between March 4, 1909, and March 4, 1911, at which latter date the term for which Mr. KNOX was elected Senator expires, Congress should again increase the compensation of the Secretary of State above $8,000; then who can deny that not only the letter of the Constitution would have been disregarded, but its spirit, even as that "spirit" is understood and defined by the friends of the Senate bill?

If the construction which the friends of this bill contend for is sound, and the status of the salary at the very date of appointment is to be alone considered, how easy it would be to reduce this salary from $12,000 to $8,000 on the 3d day of March, 1909, let Senator KNOX qualify as Secretary of State on the 4th day of March, 1909, and then on the 5th day of March, after he had been appointed and confirmed as Secretary, restore the salary to $12,000. In the event procedure of that kind were had, what would become both of the letter and the "spirit" of the Constitution? And the fact that such procedure is possible under the "construction" contended for by the advocates of this bill is the plainest demonstration of the unsoundness of their contention and the surest warning against the danger of such tampering with the Constitution.

It is my earnest hope that when the President-elect and the distinguished gentleman whom he has selected to head his Cabinet examine into this question carefully, and with the great legal ability for which both of them are so justly distinguished, that, regardless of any action of Congress on this salary matter, neither of them will be willing to signalize the new administration's advent by so patent, so palpable a violation of the Constitution they have sworn to support. It will be most unfortunate if these gentlemen do not rise not only to the proprieties but to the duty of the occasion.

So far as I am concerned, my course in this matter is easy enough. I believe the Constitution says exactly what it means and means precisely what it says. I am convinced that Mr. KNOX will not be eligible to appointment as Secretary of State until March 4, 1911, and that no "enabling act" of Congress can override, repeal, or modify the Constitution so as to make him eligible. I shall not, therefore, lend myself to this scheme to override the Constitution and to disregard its plain, simple, and unambiguous language.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that I feel constrained to oppose the measure manifestly for the relief of the distinguished Senator from the State of Pennsylvania. But I took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and my oath does not permit a violation, either by direct or indirect methods. This act is a plain evasion of our constitutional oath.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill for three reasons.

First. It is against the express letter of the Constitution. The plain provision is, if the salary of the Secretary of State "shall have been increased" during the six years' term for which Senator KNOX was elected, he can not, under the circumstances here dealt with, hold the office of Secretary of State.

Second. Such act is a palpable violation of the undeniable spirit of the Constitution.

Third. If it were indisputable that we are not violating the letter and spirit of the Constitution, to pass this bill is not wise as a question of policy and is a breach of all appropriate ethics that should control us in this emergency. It is utterly repugnant to my conception of the proprieties that ought to guide and determine our conclusions on this occasion. It is true on its face the act is a simple proposition to reduce the salary of the Secretary of State from $12,000 per annum, at which sum it was fixed March 4, 1907, to $8,000. But it would be an unpardonable and cowardly evasion to say that nothing else is involved.

In 1905 Senator KNOX was elected to the United States Senate for a term of six years, ending March 4, 1911. During this time the Fifty-ninth Congress, of which he was a Member, increased the salary of the Secretary of State from $8,000 to $12,000 per annum. By the Constitution, Article I, section 6, Senator KNOX, who is proposed by Mr. Taft for Secretary of State for the term beginning March 4, 1909, is disqualified. The material part of the article and section is as follows:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

Here we have a constitutional clause, and an act of Congress increasing the salary of an office to be filled by Senator KNOX during the term for which he was elected to serve as United States Senator. It is manifest to me that Senator KNOX is disqualified by the Constitution and not by the act of Congress. Nor can another act of Congress decreasing the salary of the Secretary of State qualify him, once he is disqualified by constitutional provision. We can not nullify a patent constitutional disqualification by a trick of legal legerdemain. Was the salary of the Secretary of State increased during Senator KNOX's six-year term in the Senate? It can not be denied. The Constitution makers unmistakably wrote in this article that when the emoluments "shall have been increased" during his term in Congress, a constitutional bar is raised against appointment of such Senator or Member until the congressional term becomes extinct. It will not do to say that the salary of Secretary of State has not been "increased" because this act "decreases" it and it then becomes as if it had never been.

The fact forever remains that such salary has been both "increased" and "decreased." You can not reverse this fact by reason of interpretation or legal enactment. You might, with the same consistency of logic, undertake to legislate that war with Mexico was not a fact in our history, but a mere dream; that Niagara Falls does not stand between the boundaries of this country and Canada; that Yellowstone Park is a myth; the forest of big trees in California a figment of the imagination, and the historic truth of the tragic deaths of Lincoln, Garfield, and McKinley the idle vaporings of newspaper correspondents. Ah, Mr. Speaker, physical and historic facts are immutable, and no legislative action can eradicate or destroy them. The salary has been increased, and no decreasing act can make the established fact disappear, but only establishes another fact—a decreased salary by Congress. In my judgment, without meaning to be critical, if Mr. Taft and Senator KNOX had heeded the voice of wisdom when this question arose, instead of rushing it through Congress with the powerful force of Senatorial courtesy and the strong machine of the House Committee on Rules, they would have hesitated and deliberated and said, "Let this great question go to the law committees—the Committees on the Judiciary—of the two Houses, where it could be weighed, considered, and analyzed from every standpoint." Then, if favorable report had been made to Congress, the American people would have concurred with certain approval. If not, a taint of doubt being left in the proposition, they would have said, and so would the people, "Let this class legislation and special favoritism for the accommodation of one man become no part of our legislative annals."

If ever a question deserved treatment in decency and order it is this one where some of us fear we might be violating our oath of office. But you will perpetrate the act, and let me prophecy that Mr. Taft and Senator KNOX, before the 4th of March, will come to the conclusion that this is of such doubtful constitutional warrant and propriety they can not afford to avail themselves of its special favoritism and convenience.

There is one other question I desire to raise. At this session of Congress the Senate, of which Senator KNOX is now a Member, proposes to raise the salary of the President, and has already taken action to that effect. In my judgment, your party will yet ratify such Senate action in both Houses of Congress. Then Senator KNOX, being Secretary of State under Mr. Taft, will be in line for the Presidency in the event of the death of the President and Vice-President. In such an emergency he would be ineligible to the Presidency and would be laboring under a double constitutional disqualification on account of the raise of salary of the Secretary of State and of the President. In my mind it is unwise and not sound policy to pass this act and open the way to difficulties and at the same time bend and break the organic law of our Republic. No man is so great and good that it should be done. With regret, but with unwavering firmness, I shall record my vote against it.

Mr. Speaker, I have said the proposed action here not only violates the express language of the Constitution, but the spirit and intent as well, and I shall now attempt to demonstrate my statement by historic reference.

You may search the history of the proceedings of the Philadelphia convention of 1787 and you will find nothing authorizing the construction put forth by those maintaining the affirmative of this proposition. There is no hint that the spirit pervading the Constitutional Convention warranted holding that where a salary had been increased and a constitutional disqualification fixed on a Senator or a Member it might then be undone and reversed by a bit of legal juggling such as this. There is no suggestion of such pathway out of the difficulty. That language, "shall have been increased," stands forth boldly to reveal its meaning as does the sunshine by day to herald the fact that the night is over and the stars obscured. At the first point in the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention when this question becomes material we find, on June 26, 1787, Mr. Williamson moved a resolution so penned as to admit of the following question:

First. Whether the Members of the Senate should be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, offices under the United States; secondly, whether, etc., under the particular States.

Mr. Gerry and Mr. Madison moved to add to Mr. Williamson's first question "and for one year thereafter." This was carried.

To the first question in Mr. Williamson's resolution, "ineligible to and incapable," and so forth, there was unanimous agreement, and it was adopted. Then these propositions, along with others, were referred to a committee on detail on July 26, and are to be found numbered 4 in a series of resolutions.

The language here used is as follows:

That the Members of the second branch of the Legislature of the United States ought to be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, any office under the authority of the United States (except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the second branch) during the term for which they are elected, and for one year thereafter.

On August 6 the Committee on Detail made a report, and in it is found the following provision, embodied in section 9:

The Members of each House shall be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, any office under the authority of the United States during the time for which they shall respectively be elected; and the Members of the Senate shall be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, any such office for one year afterwards.

Here the committee emphasized the ineligibility of Senators and discriminated against them, so anxious were the fathers to guard the point by extending the period of ineligibility "for one year" after their terms expired, thus failing to apply that disqualification to Representatives, and evincing an indisputable spirit to shield the Senate and Executive from the influences that one might exert upon the other and unequivocally separating these two departments from one another by rendering them distinct and independent.

Mr. Speaker, I challenge attention to the "spirit" here made manifest and emphatic. There is no hint that we may trifle and juggle with Cabinet offices and emoluments thereof, but a plain suggestion and injunction that the Senate must hold itself aloof from executive functions and favors and not seek ways to get into the Cabient when the Constitution interdicts. It is not meant that Senator KNOX is endeavoring to do this, but simply pointed out that the framers of the Constitution intended by letter and spirit that no Senator should ever surmount this obstacle in any kind of fashion, with or without the aid of Congress. Nor will chloroforming this section of the Constitution to-day appeal to or satisfy those who still regard its provisions with patriotic reverence.

The next glimpse of this section of the Constitution is on September 1, when Mr. Brearly, to whose committee were referred certain postponed parts of the Constitution, made partial report in this language:

The Members of each House shall be ineligible to any civil office under the authority of the United States during the time for which they shall respectively be elected; and no person holding an office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office.

It is peculiarly appropriate here to quote the exact language and reasoning of some of the delegates to the Philadelphia convention on this identical point.

Mr. Sherman was "for entirely incapacitating Members of the Legislature." He thought "their eligibility to office would give too much influence to the Executive." He said:

The incapacity ought at least to be extended to cases where salaries would be increased, as well as created, during the term of the Member.

He mentioned also the expedient by which the restriction could be evaded, to wit:

An existing officer might be translated to an office created, and a Member of the Legislature be then put into the office vacated.

Mr. Randolph was "inflexibly against inviting men into the legislature by the prospect of being appointed to offices."

Here is what the great Virginian, George Mason, thought:

Instead of excluding merit, the ineligibility will keep out corruption by excluding office hunters.

On September 1 Mr. Williamson moved to insert the words "created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased" before the word "during" in the report of the committee. This amendment was adopted. Hence, it is clear to my mind if our fathers, in writing the Constitution, enjoined upon us that we, as Senators or Members, should not benefit by the offices we created or by the increased emoluments thereof, they also, by the same letter and spirit, enjoined upon us that we should not benefit a Senator, as in the case under consideration, by legal legerdemain in attempting to obviate, by statute, a constitutional infirmity for the purpose of advancing his official station in removing an obstacle standing in his pathway from the Senate to a Cabinet office, where our fathers fixed constitutional barriers to forever remain.

Where are the letter and spirit? They remain where the writers of our Constitution placed them, as sentinels to give the alarm in such emergencies as this, when our eagerness to favor a distinguished man and new administration are about to outrun our judgments. We are importuned to bend a little, to lean only slightly to error, in order that we may do an act of kindness and convenience.

It must not be; there is no power in Venice
Can alter a decree established:
'Twill be recorded for a precedent;
And many an error, by the same example,
Will rush into the state: it can not be.

Mr. Speaker, when the committee on style finally reported the Constitution, the material part of this article and section appeared as follows, and became part of the permanent document:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

Mr. Speaker, I reiterate, with all due respect to those whose views are different, that the letter, the spirit, and the proprieties cry out against this evasion and subterfuge.

Entertaining a high regard for the distinguished Senator and wishing Mr. Taft's administration preeminent success, I must halt and do reverence to my constitutional oath as I see it, and meet the question with fair and honorable intent by considering all the known and notorious facts, and in so doing my conscience impels me to vote against the expedient here offered. Our forefathers wrote the Constitution in order that their posterity might be governed by written guaranty of liberty and republican institutions perpetuated, that we might look to and invoke it in hours of trial and peril. Mr. Speaker, that ancient document is not yet obsolete; we have not yet outgrown its sacred provisions; there is not yet need of shutting our eyes and blindly trampling under foot any part of the safeguards it contains. If liberty is to survive and constitutional government to find lodgment in permanent history, sacred reverence for the genius and spirit and letter of this beloved instrument alone will perpetuate them. For my part, I am not willing to disregard historic fact and constitutional guaranty for any man or party in the Republic. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, in discussing this important question no lawyer who cares for his reputation will approach it from a partisan standpoint, but give it serious and conscientious consideration. No man's political affiliations should color his understanding of the meaning of our great charter, the organic law upon which our magnificent Government is built. The bill before us might well be styled "A bill for the relief of Senator KNOX." I want to say before proceeding further that I wish sincerely that I might aid Mr. Taft in gratifying his desire to have Mr. KNOX's disqualification for the portfolio of Secretary of State removed, but I am compelled to look at the great question in the light of the law, assisted by well-established rules of construction and interpretation.

The term of Senator KNOX began March 4, 1905, and will therefore end until March 3, 1911. On February 26, 1907, the salary of the office of Secretary of State, to which Mr. Taft wishes to appoint Mr. KNOX, was increased from $8,000 to $12,000 per annum. It is claimed that Senator KNOX voted for this increase, but this is immaterial. The act has been in effect, therefore, for the last two years. The bill now seeks to reduce the salary back to $8,000, in order to relieve Mr. KNOX of the inhibition contained in Article I, section 6, clause 2, of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

> No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time.

Now, suppose this bill becomes a law, will the Senator be eligible to appointment in Mr. Taft's Cabinet, prior to March 4, 1911? I am compelled to say that in my humble opinion he will not be. I have studied the question with great care and have examined every report and decision that bears on the question in the least. The Constitution must be given its plain meaning. Note the language of Judge Lamar in Lake County v. Rollins (130 U. S. Reports):

> If the words convey a definite meaning which involves no absurdity, nor any contradiction of other parts of the instrument, then that meaning, apparent on the face of the instrument must be accepted, and neither the courts nor the legislature have the right to add or to take from it. (Newell v. People, 7 N. Y., 9, 97; Hill v. Chicago, 60 Ill., 86; Denn v. Reid, 10 Pet., 524; Leonard v. Wiseman, 31 Md., 201, 204; People v. Potter, 47 N. Y., 375; Cooley, Const. Lim., 57; Story on Const., 400; Beardstown v. Virginia, 76 Ill., 34.) See also, where a law is expressed in plain and unambiguous terms, whether those terms are general or limited, the legislation should be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed, and consequently no room is left for construction. (United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 358, 399; Doggett v. Florida Railroad, 99 U. S., 72.)
> There is even stronger reason for adhering to this rule in the case of a constitution than in that of a statute, since the latter is passed by a deliberative body of small numbers, a large proportion of whose members are more or less conversant with the niceties of construction and discrimination and fuller opportunity exists for attention and revision of such a character, while constitutions, although framed by conventions, are yet created by the votes of the entire body of electors in a State, the most of whom are little disposed, even if they were able, to engage in such refinements. The simplest and most obvious interpretation of a constitution, if in itself sensible, is the most likely to be that meant by the people in its adoption. Such considerations give weight to that line of remark of which The People v. Purdy (2 Hill, 31, 36) affords an example. There Bronson, J., commenting upon the danger of departing from the import and meaning of the language used to express the intent, and hunting after probable meanings not clearly embraced in that language, says: "In this way the Constitution is made to mean one thing by one man and something else by another, until in the end it is in danger of being rendered a mere dead letter, and that, too, where the language is so plain and explicit that it is impossible to make it mean more than one thing unless we lose sight of the instrument itself and roam at large in the boundless fields of speculation."
> Words are common signs that mankind use to declare their intentions to one another; and when the words of a man express his meaning clearly, distinctly, and perfectly, we have no occasion to have recourse to any other means of interpretation.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear to even a layman as to what the clause in the Constitution says and means. No technical language is used. No words of doubtful meanings are there. No ambiguous or uncertain thought is expressed. If the emoluments of any office have been increased during a Senator's term, he can not be appointed to that office until his term has expired. To know that the sun shines at midday we have but to look up into the heavens and see it. It is hard to use an argument that it is shining when one has but to look and see it; so it is hard to argue a question which seems so clear as that clause of the Constitution under discussion. The moment the emoluments of the office are increased by law, that moment the lawmaker's ineligibility to fill the office sets up, and must continue to the end of his term. It is not the law increasing the emoluments that disqualifies him to be appointed to such office, but it is the Constitution; and being once disqualified by that instrument the disqualification can not be removed by mere legislative enactment.

Senator KNOX is unquestionably disqualified now, and has been for the past two years. No one denies this. What disqualified him? Was it the statute or the Constitution? The question answers itself, and one has but to read the clause in question to answer that it is the Constitution which created the disqualification. Then, if he is now constitutionally disqualified, how can the Congress qualify him by passing this bill? When the act of February 26, 1907, became a law eo instanti Mr. KNOX became disqualified to hold the office of Secretary of State and has remained disqualified ever since. His disqualification, as I have said, is not statutory, but constitutional; and, having once attached, can not be remedied by legislative enactment. Everyone admits that unless this bill passes he is clearly disqualified by the Constitution; and if so disqualified, how can Congress qualify him by passing this bill? The law increasing the salary of the office of Secretary of State was enacted in the Fifty-ninth Congress, and the Secretary of State has been drawing the larger salary since that time.

So the act which enabled the Constitution to disqualify Mr. KNOX is not in fieri, but is a completed, accomplished fact, and the Constitution effected the disqualification the instant the bill became a law.

If the passing of the bill before us to-day will now qualify Mr. KNOX for the high position of Secretary of State, why could not he have been appointed to this office February 27, 1907, and have served as such until some one should have raised the point, and, the point being raised, then Congress could have reduced his salary to $8,000, and all would be well? Does anyone claim that his occupancy of the office under these circumstances and his appointment to such office would have been legal? I take it that no one would claim such. If not, how could the repeal of the statute making the increase in salary make the original appointment now legal? Shall we argue that for the past two years he has been clearly disqualified, but during the next two years he will be qualified, and yet no change take place in the Constitution? That would be tantamount to saying that it is the statute which first disqualifies and then qualifies a person for such office, without regard to the Constitution. We all know that it is the Constitution which, upon the happenings of a certain event, attaches irrevocably the disqualification, and then such disqualification can not be affected by any statutory retraction or amendment. The thing being once done can not be undone except by amendment to the Constitution. A constitutional disability having once attached, can not be removed by legislation.

The people and Mr. KNOX can not be placed in statu quo by passing this bill. The object of the clause of the Constitution in question was, according to that great judge, Story:

> To take away, as far as possible, any improper bias, in the vote of the Representative and to secure to the constituents some solemn pledge of disinterestedness.

The repeal of the law increasing the salary at this time, two years after its enactment, can not affect the motives or the interests or noninterest of the Senator at the time the bill was passed. We can not know, nor can we inquire, nor does it matter, what a Senator's motives were in voting for an increase of the emoluments or the creation of a new office, and therefore the fathers, when they framed the Constitution, pronounced in that instrument the irrebuttable disqualification the moment the offending event happens.

Suppose the Constitution should declare in plain terms that no person convicted of forgery should ever hold office, and suppose A should be convicted, but two years after his conviction the legislature should repeal the law against forgery, could A ever hold office? I do not think so. The repeal of the statute, the violation of which caused the constitutional disqualification to attach, could not remove that disqualification; nor can the repeal of the statute, the passage of which caused the constitutional disqualification to attach to Mr. KNOX, remove his disqualification.

The case of Hill v. The Territory of Washington (2 Washington Reports) seems to be a case almost in point. It was against the law of the Territory for any officer of the Regular Army to be elected to any civil office. Hill was a retired member of the army and was elected treasurer in 1880 of King County. Suit was instituted to oust Hill from his office. The legislature of the Territory, however, in 1881 repealed the disqualifying statute. In a well-considered opinion the court says:

> Again, at the time of the election of the defendant to said office he was, if he belonged to the Army of the United States, ineligible thereto by the laws of the Territory; hence all votes cast for him were of no effect, and the declaration of his election could confer no rights upon him; and, if all laws that rendered him so ineligible were afterwards repealed, such repeal could not in itself validate such election and confer upon him the right to hold said office until he had been legally elected or appointed thereto.

The case of Senator Ransom from my own State shows how strictly the law officers of the Government have construed this important clause of the Constitution. General Ransom's term as Senator from North Carolina began March 4, 1889, and ended March 4, 1895. In March, 1891, the compensation of the minister to Mexico was increased from $12,000 to $17,500 per annum. On February 23, 1895, ten days before the Senator's term expired, he was appointed and confirmed minister to Mexico, and on the 4th of March following took the oath of office. The Attorney-General was called upon for an opinion as to the legality of the appointment, and it was held in a clear opinion that the appointment was illegal. In passing on this case, the Attorney-General, among other things, said:

> The case in hand, however, is governed by the other prohibition, which is against the appointment to any civil office under the United States the emoluments whereof have been increased during the time for which he was elected.
> Here, plainly, the prohibition is not against the holding, but the appointment. * * *
> He (the President) can appoint only those who, under the Constitution, are eligible to the office. His appointment of one not eligible is a nullity.

The Auditor for the State and other Departments, in discussing General Ransom's case, said:

> The Constitution of the United States provides by the second clause, section 6, Article I, that "No Senator or Representative shall, during the term for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time." The language is plain and unmistakable, and in view of the fact that the salary of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Mexico was increased during Mr. Ransom's term in the Senate, he was constitutionally ineligible for appointment to the office during that term.

The decision of the Attorney-General in the case of Governor Kirkwood is one of the strongest against the eligibility of Senator KNOX that has been rendered. Governor Kirkwood was elected Senator from Iowa, his term beginning March 4, 1877, and expiring March 4, 1883. In 1881 he resigned as Senator to accept the position of Secretary of the Interior. In that same year—1881—he resigned as Secretary of the Interior and became a private citizen. While he was such private citizen and while his successor was serving as Senator from Iowa, but before Governor Kirkwood's term of office had expired—it being March, 1882—the office of Tariff Commissioner was created by Congress, and President Harrison wished to appoint Mr. Kirkwood to this office. The Attorney-General, who was called upon for an opinion in the case, after citing Article I, section 6, clause 2, of the Constitution, says:

> It is unnecessary to consider the question of the policy which occasioned such constitutional prohibition. I must be controlled exclusively by the positive terms of the provision of the Constitution. The language is precise and clear, and, in my opinion, disables him from receiving the appointment. The rule is absolute, as expressed in the terms of the Constitution, and behind that I can not go, but must accept it as presented regarding the application in this case. Among the decisions of the state courts four cases only were found in which a like constitutional prohibition has been considered. They are not directly in point here, and I can obtain no help from them to avoid the conclusion I have before expressed. They maintain in effect the same principle and adopt the same rule of interpretation which, I here submit, disables Governor Kirkwood from receiving the appointment.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore am opposed to the passage of this bill, for the reason that we all know it is for the purpose of attempting to make Senator KNOX eligible to be appointed Secretary of State by Mr. Taft, and for the further reason that, in my opinion, whether the bill is passed or not, he will not be eligible to receive the appointment before his term as Senator from Pennsylvania expires, which will not be until March 4, 1911.

I can not give assent to the doctrine that public and temporary expediency would excuse a breach, however slight, of the Constitution; nor can I agree that it is permissible to violate any provision of that great charter, even though no harm apparently may flow from such violation. Its every article is sacred and should be jealously guarded by all sincere lovers of constitutional government, and we should never permit its slightest violation, even though such violation should bring about a condition personally pleasant and answer a popular demand.

It is far better for the country to be deprived of the eminent services of Senator KNOX as Secretary of State for two years longer than to fracture our paramount law upon which the entire future of the Republic depends. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

21 Wisconsin Reports, State ex rel. Ryan v. Boyd, page 212:

"Mr. Justice Story, in commenting upon a kindred provision in the Constitution of the United States, says: 'The reasons for excluding persons from offices who have been concerned in creating them, or increasing their emoluments, are to take away, as far as possible, any improper bias in the vote of the Representative and to secure to the constituents some solemn pledge of his disinterestedness. The actual provision, however, does not go to the extent of the principle; for his appointment is restricted only during the time for which he was elected, thus leaving in full force every influence upon his mind, if the period of his election is short, or the duration of it is approaching its natural termination.' (Story's Com. on Const., p. 684.) The learned author adds, that while it has sometimes been a matter of regret that the disqualification has not been made coextensive with the supposed mischief, and thus have forever excluded Members from the possession of offices created or rendered more lucrative by themselves, yet that perhaps there is quite as much wisdom in leaving the provision where it now is."

Volume II, Decisions of the Comptroller, pages 129 and 130, in re of accounts of Hon. Matt Ransom, for compensation as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Mexico:

"A Senator of the United States is prohibited by section 6, Article I, of the Constitution, during the time for which he was elected, from being appointed to any civil office the emoluments of which have been increased during such time.

"R., a Senator of the United States, elected for a term of six years, to expire March 3, 1895, during which time the salary of the office of minister to Mexico was increased, was on February 23, 1895, nominated to that office, confirmed by the Senate, and commissioned by the Presdient. He took the oath of office on March 5. Such appointment was prohibited by section 6, Article I, of the Constitution, and R.'s salary can not be paid."

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE TREASURY,
September 6, 1895.

The Auditor for the State and other Departments having, under date of July 13, 1895, made an original construction of the following clause in the diplomatic and consular appropriation act of March 2, 1895 (28 Stat., 815)—

"Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Russia and Mexico, at $17,500 each, $35,000;"

transmitted his decision thereon to the Comptroller for his approval, disapproval, or modification. Said decision is as follows:

"Mr. Ransom has presented accounts for salary as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Mexico, covering the time from and including March 4 to and including June 30 ultimo.

"It becomes my duty as the accounting officer to whom the accounts are assigned for audit and settlement to decide whether or not Mr. Ransom is entitled to the compensation which he claims.

"Mr. Ransom was a Senator from the State of North Carolina for the term beginning March 4, 1889, and ending March 3, 1895. During the said term the salary of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Mexico was increased by Congress from $12,000 per annum to $17,500 per annum by act making appropriations for consular and diplomatic services, approved March 3, 1891. (26 Stat., 1053.) Congress has since continued to appropriate the latter sum, and at that rate salary is claimed by Mr. Ransom.

"The Constitution of the United States provides by the second clause of section 6, Article I, that 'No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.' The language is plain and unmistakable, and in view of the fact that the salary of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary was increased during Mr. Ransom's term in the Senate, he was constitutionally ineligible for appointment to that office during that term. In the words of Attorney-General Brewster (17 Opinion A. G., 365): 'It is necessary to consider the question of the policy which occasioned this constitutional prohibition. I must be controlled exclusively by the positive terms of the provisions of the Constitution. The language is precise and clear, and, in my opinion, disables him from receiving the appointment. The rule is absolute, as expressed in the terms of the Constitution, and behind that I can not go, but must accept it as presented regarding its application in this case.'"

On page 208, same volume, Decisions of the Comptroller:

"Mr. Ransom was, until the expiration of Congress on March 3, a Senator of the United States from the State of North Carolina, his term expiring on that date. On March 3, 1891, the compensation of the minister to Mexico was increased from $12,000 to $17,500 per annum, and has continued at the latter figure from that time to and including the present fiscal year. When the act increasing the salary of the minister to Mexico was passed Mr. Ransom was a Member of the Senate. The fact that the salary of the minister to Mexico was increased while Mr. Ransom was a Senator was overlooked both by the President and the Senate on February 23, when he was nominated and confirmed, and was not discovered until some time after Mr. Ransom had been appointed, qualified, and acted as the minister to Mexico. For the reasons stated by the Attorney-General in his opinion of August 15, 1895 (21 Opin. A. G., —), the appointment of Mr. Ransom under the circumstances was illegal, as in violation of paragraph 2, section 6, of Article I of the Constitution."

On page 211, volume 21, Opinions by Attorneys-General, we have the following by Hon. Holmes Conrad, Acting Attorney-General under Hon. Judson Harmon, of Ohio:

MEMBER OF CONGRESS; * * * APPOINTMENT TO OFFICE.

"During the term of R., as a Senator of the United States, Congress increased the salary attached to a civil office under the authority of the United States. On February 23, 1895, the President nominated R. (whose term would not expire until March 4, 1895) to the office in question, and on the same day such nomination was confirmed by the Senate. R. took the oath of office on March 4, 1895, and his commission was delivered to him the following day. Held, 1, the nomination by the President and the confirmation by the Senate constituted the appointment to the office in question; and,

"2. Such appointment was a nullity, because in conflict with paragraph 2, section 6, Article I of the Constitution, which prohibits the appointment of a Member of Congress during the term for which he was elected to an office the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time."

Matthew W. Ransom was the United States Senator from the State of North Carolina for the term beginning March 4, 1889. During the said term the salary of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Mexico was increased from $12,000 per annum to $17,500 per annum by act of Congress, approved March 3, 1891, making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service. (26 Stat., 1053.) Congress has since continued to appropriate the latter sum. On February 23, 1895, Mr. Ransom was nominated by the President as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Mexico, and the nomination was confirmed the same day. The commission bears date of February 23. According to the statement of the President and his private secretary, Mr. Thurber, the commission was signed March 5. Mr. Ransom took the oath of office March 4, after the senatorial term had expired, and his commission was delivered to him the following day."

The occasion of your request for my opinion as to the duty of the Department of State in the premises appears to be a decision of the Auditor for the State and other Departments, holding that Mr. Ransom is not entitled to salary as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Mexico because of the constitutional provision of section 6 of Article I of the Federal Constitution.

Paragraph 2, section 6, Article I, of the Constitution is as follows:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

Here is contained a prohibition against the appointment to office of Senators and Representatives, and also a prohibition against one holding an office from being a Member of either House of Congress.

It has been repeatedly held that the acceptance of any office under the United States by a Member of either House of Congress operates a vacation of his seat. He is disabled by the Constitution from holding an office while a Member of either House.

The case in hand, however, is governed by the other prohibition, which is against the appointment to any civil office under the authority of the United States the emoluments whereof have been increased during the time for which he was elected.

Here plainly the prohibition is not against the holding, but against the appointment. * * *

He (the President) can appoint, however, only those who, under the Constitution, are eligible to office. His appointment of one not eligible is a nullity.

One who was a Senator or Representative during the time in which the emoluments of any civil office under the authority of the United States were increased is ineligible to such office.

Judge Story says:

"The reasons for excluding persons from offices who have been concerned in creating them or increasing their emoluments are to take away, as far as possible, any improper bias in the vote of the Representative and to secure to the constituents some solemn pledge of his disinterestedness. * * *"

I am of the opinion, then, that Mr. Ransom's appointment as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Mexico was made on February 23, 1895; that that was during the time for which he was elected a Senator in Congress; and it appearing from your letter that it was during that time that the emoluments of the office of minister to Mexico were increased, Mr. Ransom was ineligible to appointment to that office.

HOLMES CONRAD,
Acting Attorney-General.

On page 365, volume 17, Opinions of Attorneys-General, we find the following by Hon. William Harrison Brewster:

APPOINTMENT TO CIVIL OFFICE.

K. was elected and qualified as Senator from Iowa for a term which would expire March 4, 1883. He resigned in March, 1881, to accept the position of Secretary of the Interior, which office he also resigned in the latter part of the same year. Since then, by act of May 15, 1882, chapter 145, the office of tariff commissioner was created. Advised that the second clause of section 6, of the first article of the Constitution disqualifies K. for appointment to such office.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, May 26, 1882.

SIR: It having been suggested that Governor Kirkwood might not be eligible to be appointed on the tariff commission under certain provisions of the Constitution, after conference at the Cabinet the matter was referred by you to me for examination. Knowing that it was your desire to appoint Governor Kirkwood, as it was also the hope of all the members of the Cabinet that he would be appointed, I have given the subject presented to me a serious consideration and a thorough examination, in conjunction with the Solicitor-General, whose assistance I invited in conference upon the subject. The opinion that I now give is the product of that joint examination.

The Solicitor-General has deposited with me in my department a written opinion concurring with me.

Mr. Kirkwood was elected and qualified as Senator from Iowa for a term which would expire in March, 1883. In March, 1881, he resigned to accept the position of Secretary of the Interior, and, having recently resigned that office, is now in private life. Since his second resignation the office of tariff commissioner has been created by act of Congress, and the question is, whether, in those circumstances, the second clause in the first article, section 6, of the Constitution of the United States, disqualifies him for appointment as such commissioner. The clause is as follows:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

It is unnecessary to consider the question of the policy which occasioned such constitutional prohibition. I must be controlled exclusively by the positive terms of the provision of the Constitution. The language is precise and clear, and in my opinion disables him from receiving the appointment. The rule is absolute, as expressed in the terms of the Constitution, and behind that I can not go, but must accept it as it is presented, regarding its application in this case. I caused careful search through the opinions of the Attorneys-General for precedent upon this question, but none has been found. No opinion is recorded in which the subject is considered. Neither is any record of published cases in the courts of the United States that touch upon this point. Among the decisions of the state courts, four cases only were found in which a like constitutional prohibition has been considered. They are not directly in point here, and I can obtain no help from them to avoid the conclusion I have before expressed. They maintain in effect the same principle and adopt the same rule of interpretation, which, I here submit, disables Governor Kirkwood from receiving this appointment.

I am, sir, with great respect,

BENJAMIN HARRISON BREWSTER.

THE PRESIDENT.

In volume 2, Washington Territory Reports, on page 147, George D. Hill, plaintiff in error, v. The Territory of Washington, ex rel. Elwood Evans, prosecuting attorney, etc., defendant in error:

"The election of a person to office in this Territory who, by reason of belonging to the Army of the United States at the time of his election, was ineligible thereto, is not rendered valid by a repeal of the statute so disqualifying him.

"Capt. George D. Hill, plaintiff in error, was, prior to December, 1870, an officer of the Regular Army of the United States, at which time he was placed on the retired list with the rank of captain.

"Subsequently he was for a number of terms elected treasurer of King County, Wash.

"He was reelected at the general November election of 1880 and entered upon the duties of the office under this election."

Opinion by Hoyt, associate justice, page 149:

"By the pleading in this cause it was admitted that the plaintiff in error, the defendant below, was declared elected to the office of treasurer of King County in November, 1880, and that in pursuance to such declaration he entered into and took possession of said office and entered upon the discharge of the duties thereof, and that he is still so in possession of said office.

"It was also admitted that at the time of said election said defendant was, and still is, an officer upon the retired list of the United States Army. And the question decided below, and to be decided here, is as to whether under the facts so admitted judgment of ouster should be entered against said defendant. * * *

"It is virtually conceded by the argument upon this point that under the law of the Territory, as it stood prior to the amendment thereto in 1881, the Territory would have been the proper party plaintiff; but it is contended that the action of the legislature in so amending said law that it was no longer a violation thereof for an officer on the retired list to hold such office had so changed the relation of the Territory that it no longer had any interest in the question; as if the laws of the United States only were being violated, they and not the Territory were the proper party plaintiffs.

"But if we concede the entire argument of the defendant upon this question, it would not then appear that said amendment could have any effect upon this cause, for this action was commenced before said amendment was made, and the rights of the parties, as they existed before the enactment of said amendment, were protected by the provisions of the act which contained said amendment. * * * Again, at the time of the election of the defendant to said office, he was, if he belonged to the army of the United States, ineligible thereto by the laws of the Territory; hence all votes cast for him were of no effect, and the declaration of his election could confer no rights upon him; and if all laws that rendered him so ineligible were afterwards repealed, such repeal could not in itself validate such election and confer upon him the right to hold said office until he had been legally elected or appointed thereto."

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, the legislation proposed by the measure now under discussion finds no parallel in the legislative history of the country. It seems to me, after a careful consideration of the bill and its purposes, that we are embarked on a very dangerous voyage, one beset with dangers and pitfalls that will, if this bill becomes a law, establish a precedent that will be far more honored in its breach than in its observance.

The bill might well be entitled "A bill to relieve an embarrassing political situation." There is a brave and manly way open for the relief here sought, and that path should be pursued. Congress should not undertake, by indirection, to relieve a situation that is so easily remedied by the interested parties themselves.

The advocates of this bill inform the House that this legislation is necessary to enable Mr. KNOX to become Secretary of State in the Cabinet of the incoming President. All are agreed that under the plain provision of the Constitution he is not eligible, and we are asked in our capacity as lawmakers, to render him eligible by doubtful legislation:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the term for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such term. * * *

This provision was written in the Constitution for a wise and beneficent purpose, and for the first time in our history we propose to join in violation of not only the spirit of this provision, but the letter of it as well.

There can be no question as to the wisdom of this constitutional enactment, and a strict compliance with its every provision can but have a tendency to uplift our national life.

The question for us to settle is, "Does the paragraph of the Constitution quoted render Mr. KNOX ineligible to the office of Secretary of State; if so, will this legislation make him eligible?" That must depend upon the language used.

What is meant by the words "or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such term?" The salary of this office has been raised from $8,000 to $12,000 per year during the prohibited time. The present Secretary of State and his immediate predecessor have both enjoyed their increase in the salary. Can we say, therefore, by any reasonable rule of construction that the emoluments have not been increased? They have been increased, and now, in order to make eligible one who is now ineligible by reason of the increase, we propose to reduce the salary to what it originally was; but the fact remains that it has been increased during the prohibited time, and in my judgment this indirect method of legislation will not remove the disqualificaton now existing. If we can not remove this disqualification by direct legislation, no one will seriously urge that we can do indirectly that which can not be done directly.

Behold the spectacle that will present itself to the American people by the passage of this act. The head of the Cabinet, the chief adviser of the President, serving for $4,000 a year less compensation than the other members of the Cabinet. This subterfuge will not deceive anyone except those who support the proposition. I venture the prediction that before the prohibited term expires the salary of this office will be restored, when the humiliating confession must be made that Congress trifled with a principle to meet an emergency.

It is not contended that the President-elect and Mr. KNOX did not know of this provision of the Constitution. In addition to the presumption indulged in that every man knows the law, we have the assurance that both of them are among the greatest, if not the greatest, constitutional lawyers in public life to-day.

The strongest arguments used by the advocates of this measure is that the President-elect wants the law passed, and that it should be done this session.

I am willing to do what I may to make the incoming administration successful, but am not willing to violate the oath I have taken to support the Constitution for the personal convenience of anyone. Each of us is the keeper of his own conscience and must answer to himself and the people in what manner he has kept it. This measure is but an expedient to evade the plain provisions of the Constitution. I do not assert that this bill will be unconstitutional, but my contention is that it will not remove the disqualification of Mr. KNOX. The inhibition of the Constitution was put in force when the emoluments of the office were increased during his term in the Senate, and that prohibition will remain in spite of this legislation.

I do not doubt or question the superior ability and attainments of Mr. KNOX to fill this great office acceptably, but I maintain that this House can not afford to engage in this indirect method of legislation.

I have said that there is a brave and manly path out of this dilemma, and it should be pursued.

Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that this is not the first time in the country's history that a provision of the law has been overlooked by the President in making up his Cabinet. President Grant, as I now recall, during his first administration sent to the Senate for confirmation the name of the most successful business man of his day for Secretary of the Treasury. It was pointed out to President Grant that under the law his choice for this important office was ineligible. There was no subterfuge resorted to in this instance; no request for the enactment of legislation of doubtful efficiency; no demand for the repeal of the obnoxious provision, that he might have his personal friend in the Cabinet. On the contrary, he took the brave and manly way out of the embarrassing situation, respected the law in every particular, withdrew the nomination of his friend and selected another for the place.

I commend the course pursued by President Grant to the parties interested in this controversy.

No one can afford to assume the responsibilities of this office upon whose title there rests the least shadow of a doubt or distrust. As representatives of the people, can we afford to give our consent to the passage of a measure that does, in effect, leave a cloud upon the title, and thereby create distrust in the minds of not only the people of our own country, but also those who have to do with us in our foreign relations?

I again repeat that this House can not afford to relieve an unfortunate political situation by an act that will create a troublesome and doubtful precedent.

I hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I can not bring myself to be a part of a conspiracy to evade or violate the Constitution, or to allow or to compel the next President of the United States, immediately after taking the oath of office to support the Constitution, to violate one of its provisions. [Applause.]

It seems to me unfortunate that the country is so devoid of able men that in order to secure a Secretary of State it is compelled to violate both the letter and the spirit of the Constitution. [Applause.] It is true that the passage of this act in itself is no violation of the Constitution, but it is a violation of the proprieties of the occasion. The salary should be as great for the Secretary of State as other Cabinet officers, and the only excuse can be that we do not, if we pass this act, violate what some gentlemen say is the letter of the Constitution, and others say is the spirit of the Constitution. Mr. Speaker, we have had some criticism of the present President that he did not, because he was not a lawyer or a judge, fully appreciate the provisions of the Constitution; and we hoped that the next President—both a lawyer and a judge—would consider the Constitution inviolate and sacred [loud applause], and not commence his administration with its violation. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the only question before the House is, Shall we pass the bill reducing the salary of the Secretary of State? The House can not, in either a legislative or judicial way, determine whether or not Mr. KNOX may be made Secretary of State without doing violence to the Constitution.

Therefore we waste time by discussing the question of his eligibility, either with or without the passage of this bill. Those who oppose the reduction of salary contend that, even with the passage of this bill, Mr. KNOX would still be ineligible. If so, then why oppose the reduction of salary? Others, good lawyers, insist that the passage of this bill removes the alleged ineligibility of Mr. KNOX. Then why should not every Member vote for the bill? This is the first time I have ever seen any legislative body undertake to throw a fellow down and stuff into his pockets a larger salary than he demands—one against which he protests. If the salary can be reduced without lessening either the quantity or quality of the service rendered, why need any Member insist, over the protest of the one to be appointed, upon paying a larger salary? If the constitutional eligibility of Mr. KNOX will not be improved by the passage of this bill, as the opponents of the bill assert, why not pass it and save $4,000 to an increasing deficit? If Mr. KNOX is to be appointed Secretary of State, it is infinitely better that all reasonable question as to his eligibility be removed. Those who oppose the passage of this bill argue that the official acts of Mr. KNOX, if appointed, might be invalid, and would, at least, always be questioned. The argument, then, is in favor of the passage of this bill, for the reason that it may remove the constitutional inhibition, and everybody should want the Secretary of State legally installed into office. I take it for granted that every Member of this body, Democrat and Republican, does not wish to limit the incoming President in his efforts to get the strongest men in his party into his Cabinet.

The Democrats should be, and are, sufficiently patriotic to want an honest and an able administration. The Republicans want it because of patriotism and a selfish desire for party success. If we are denied the privilege of making an eminently successful administration of our country's affairs under Democratic control, then, as good citizens, each of us should help make it as successful as is possible under Republican control. Certainly no Democrat should put himself in the unenviable position of even apparently seeking to obstruct the dominant party in its efforts to best serve the country's interests. If Mr. KNOX's eligibiliy, as is conceded, can not be determined here, why insist that the salary of the Secretary of State be $12,000 instead of $8,000? If he is eligible, permit him to accept the smaller salary. If there is a question as to his eligibility, injunction proceedings can be had to prevent the payment of any salary. Then the highest courts of the land can pass upon the question. I see no reason in a vote against an economical and an admittedly constitutional bill in order to defeat the appointment of Mr. KNOX, or anyone else, as well as to prevent the courts from passing upon the question. I am not entirely free from doubt as to whether or not this bill removes ineligibility, but I am unwilling to set my opinion up against the opinion of the Supreme Court. If Mr. KNOX should be appointed, either with or without the passage of this bill, the Senators of the United States will be called upon to exercise their prerogative of confirming or rejecting the appointment. After a confirmation by the Senate the judgment of the courts can be invoked to finally determine whether or not the constitutional provision has been violated. Why not let the matter come to senatorial determination and judicial finding? Again I insist that the question of eligibility to office is not germane to the simple question as to whether the salary should be $12,000 or $8,000.

Mr. BANNON. Mr. Speaker, it is conceded by all that the bill now before the House does not in any way conflict with any provision of the Constitution. But it is contended that this bill, if enacted into law, will result in a violation of the Constitution. It is urged that during the time for which Senator KNOX was elected as a Senator from Pennsylvania the emoluments of the office of Secretary of State were increased and that the prospective appointment of Senator KNOX to the office of Secretary of State would be a violation of the sixth section of Article I of the Constitution.

Now, it seems to me that this question is not before the House of Representatives. It is not for us to determine whether any person nominated by the President is eligible or ineligible. That duty and that responsibility rests upon the Senate. By the act of July 27, 1789, it is provided that—

> There shall be at the seat of government an executive department to be known as the Department of State, and a Secretary of State, who shall be the head thereof.

Now, section 2 of Article II of the Constitution confers the power upon the President to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint the Secretary of State. The Senate must give its consent to the appointment, and consequently all questions as to eligibility are with the Senate and not with the House. The difficulty with the position of the opponents of this measure is that they are presuming that the President and Senate will on March 4 violate the provisions of the Constitution. The legal presumption is that they will not. The presumption not only is that they will uphold the Constitution, but that, when action is taken, they have done so. The best statement of this rule I know of is in an opinion by Judge Ranney, of the supreme court of my own State, rendered in 1852 and found in volume 1 of the Ohio State Reports at page 83. It is also a most admirable rule for members of every legislative body to follow. It is a little old-fashioned, but mighty good law. Judge Ranney says:

> The legislature is, of necessity, in the first instance, to be the judge of its own constitutional powers. Its members act under an oath to support the constitution and in every way under responsibilities as great as judicial officers. Their manifest duty is never to exercise a power of doubtful constitutionality. Doubt in their case, as in that of the courts, should be conclusive against all affirmative action. This being their duty, we are bound in all cases to presume they have regarded it, and that they are clearly convinced of their power to pass a law before they put it in the statute book. If a court, in such a case, were to annul the law while entertaining doubts upon the subject, it would present the absurdity of one department of the government overturning in doubt what another had established in settled conviction, and to make the dubious constructions of the judiciary outweigh the fixed conclusions of the general assembly.

If the courts will presume that the legislative branch has regarded the Constitution and was clearly convinced of its power to pass a law before doing so, the House must also presume that the Senate will, upon a matter of confirmation, regard the Constitution and be clearly convinced of the eligibility, under the Constitution, of the person nominated by the President before ordering confirmation.

I do not believe the salary of the Secretary of State ought to be redueed. I favored the increase, and still favor it. I favor increasing the salaries of the federal judges. Yet I will vote for this bill. The President should have the right to select his own advisers, and especially his chief adviser, subject only to the limitations in the Constitution. High tribute has been paid to-day to Senator KNOX, in all of which I concur.

The President-elect is very desirous of appointing him as his Secretary of State. If it is necessary to reduce the salary in order to render Senator KNOX eligible, and the Senator agrees to this method, and the President-elect urges it, we ought to do all we can and whatever we can to aid in removing any impediment to that appointment.

The fact that there are other men of equal ability and equal fitness for the office of Secretary of State is not a valid objection to this measure. Let us do what we can to give the President-elect the men of his selection for his Cabinet, presuming, as we should, that the President will preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution and that the Senate will support the Constitution.

After March 4 the salary of the Secretary of State, if this bill becomes a law, will be $8,000 per annum. It will then be for the Senate to say whether or not Senator KNOX is ineligible if he is nominated by the President-elect. The question will be, Were the emoluments of that office increased during the term of Senator KNOX in the Senate? What emoluments? Why, the emoluments lawfully payable after March 4 next. The salary will then be $8,000, and that amount is the lowest amount payable to that officer during the term for which Senator KNOX was elected as a Senator. Manifestly the salary which the Secretary of State will receive is no greater than the lowest amount payable during the term for which Senator KNOX was elected a Senator.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has one minute remaining.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. There must surely be some mistake. I have portioned out the time, and I thought I had two minutes remaining. There was some overrunning the time. I hope that has not been charged against my time.

The SPEAKER. On the contrary, there was some overrunning the time by inadvertence of two minutes, and that was not charged.

Mr. RUCKER. I understand that. I have allotted gentlemen so many minutes and I have two minutes remaining. The time that was used by inadvertence should not be counted.

The SPEAKER. It is not counted.

Mr. RUCKER. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Since making the announcement that I would close in one speech, I have been requested for time, and the gentleman from Missouri is willing that I shall use it. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND]. [After a pause.] As the gentleman from Missouri is not at this moment present, under the circumstances will not the gentleman from Missouri use his minute now?

Mr. RUCKER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, the time allotted to me, one minute, is quite sufficient to say that I think the only position open to this House consistent with its own dignity and consistent with its duty to maintain the integrity of the political system of which it is a part is the one so admirably stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Apart altogether from the constitutionality of this measure rises the fact that we are deliberately asked to create an inequality in the compensation to be paid public officers discharging kindred service. It does not diminish but increases my objection to it that the chief of the Cabinet is made not the first but the last in point of compensation by the salary we are asked to fix for the Secretary of State. This I consider a most vicious departure from uniformity in the law. We announce to the world one of two things by passing such an extraordinary act: Either that the Constitution itself stands in the way of a proper appointment, which is an impeachment of its excellence, or else that we have power practically to suspend it and that we must exercise the power in order to qualify the one man who is capable of discharging the functions of this office, according to the conception of capacity entertained by the President-elect—which is an impeachment of our citizenship. I do not think it is necessary to condemn the Constitution or to discredit our citizenship—to violate the spirit or letter of our fundamental law—in order that the new President may be able to find all the elements necessary to the most thorough equipment of his administration. There is abundant material in this country for the most efficient discharge of the functions of this office and of every other office under our political system. It is no disrespect to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania to say that the citizenship of which he is a member, and of which I am glad to admit he is an ornament, embraces many persons besides himself abundantly capable of discharging any function necessary to the integrity of this Government or the welfare of this country where services can be secured without either violating or evading the Constitution or passing exceptional laws. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Is this the last speech on that side?

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman announced a moment ago that he intended to close in one speech.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. But since that I went over to the gentleman and told him a moment ago that I had had a request from the gentleman from Missouri for time.

Mr. RUCKER. That is absolutely true, Mr. Speaker; but, as I understood the gentleman, he said, as the gentleman from Missouri was not on the floor, he therefore asked me to consume the balance of my time.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I announced both to the House and to the gentleman himself that, as the gentleman from Missouri was not present, I would ask him if he would not use his minute now, and then I would yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. I did not so understand; but I make no objection.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr Speaker, I ask for order and yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, the question as I see it does not at all involve a construction of the Constitution, because no constitutional question, I think, is in it. There is no question of constitutional power to raise or lower this salary, or even to abolish this office. As I understand it, the constitutional question as to eligibility arises at the time when the person alleged to be ineligible, or about whose eligibility the question is made, is appointed. Now, if this bill were passed, then upon the 4th or 5th day of next March how would the question stand, if Mr. KNOX should be nominated for Secretary of State? It would not be said, and could not be said, that if confirmed he would enter upon the duties of an office which would give him larger emoluments or a greater salary, because, as to that, the law would be precisely as it was when Mr. KNOX's term in the Senate began, and before the increase was made. Then, what would be said, if anything were said, would be that if Mr. KNOX had been appointed at some other time, with another law with reference to salary existing at that other time, he would have been ineligible.

Now, for illustration, suppose that on the first day of Mr. KNOX's service in the Senate a law had been passed and approved increasing the salary of the Secretary of State, as in fact it was increased later. Suppose that the next day of that session, the second day of his incumbency in the office, that salary had been reduced to the old amount; and suppose that five years and eleven months after that Mr. KNOX had been nominated for Secretary of State. Then the question of eligibility being raised, if it were raised, upon what would it rest? It would rest upon the fact that for a solitary day during almost six years of his incumbency in the office of Senator the salary of Secretary of State had been higher than it was when he went into that office, but not higher than when he was appointed to another office. The length of time surely has nothing to do with it.

The question to be determined is the question of propriety, and not the question of constitutionality. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I regret that those persons who favor a stricter construction of the Constitution will not permit anyone ever to act with them without he becomes also in favor of a mere technical and grammatical construction of that instrument. However, one might meet them, even upon that proposition. The passage of this bill is of course no violation of the Constitution. The bill merely provides for a reduction in the salary of the office of Secretary of State. But I prefer to debate not that question, but the other question which everybody understands to be indirectly involved in our action to-day. The Constitution says that no Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

Now, if we were to construe the Constitution merely grammatically (and every lawyer knows that the Constitution should not be so construed), if we pass this bill, then the net result will be that the salary of the office of Secretary of State will not have been increased, but will have been left where it was before it was increased.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. It is almost impossible in the time I have, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Does the gentleman think $8,000 is enough salary for the Secretary of State?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. That is not the principal question involved. That is not the question which gentlemen have themselves debated, and they ought not to undertake to distract me and take my time on that question, which they themselves declare to be a mere side issue and an evasion of this proposition.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman then declines to answer that question?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I decline to be interrupted further.

But, Mr. Speaker, constitutional propositions should not be construed in so technical a manner. In 12 Wallace, the Supreme Court of the United States says:

> Nor can it be questioned that when investigating the nature and extent of the powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress, it is indispensable to keep in view the business for which those powers were granted. This is a universal rule of construction—> applied alike to statutes, wills, contracts, and constitutions. If the general purpose of the instrument is ascertained the language of its provisions must be construed with reference to that purpose and so as to subserve it.

Says that court—

Now, can anybody doubt that if we put this office in a position where there will have been no increase of salary, where it can not by any possible construction be held that there was a hope held out to any Senator in voting for the increase that he might get that increase, if we put it back to where it was, destroying the possibility that any such purpose should have animated him in voting for the increase, have we not complied with this rule of construction and subserved the purposes of the Constitution?

And, says the Supreme Court, there are more urgent reasons for looking to the purpose sought to be accomplished in examining the powers conferred by a constitution than there is in construing a statute, will, or contract. We do not expect to find a constitution minute in details.

In connection with the rule of construction laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States just cited, let us see what the object is of the constitutional provision which we are considering.

The reason for excluding persons from office, says Story, who have been concerned in creating them, or increasing their emoluments, is to take away, as far as possible, any improper motive in the vote of the Representative, and to secure to his constituents some solemn pledge of his disinterestedness.

The object of the Constitution is plain to everybody. I have taken the trouble, however, to cite this great authority for the statement of the purpose of the Constitution.

Now, then, if we take away that increase of salary, will we not have strictly complied with the Constitution? Gentlemen talk as if there was a constitutional ineligibility on the part of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, the only ineligibility is created by statute; and that ineligibility which Congress has by law created Congress can by law remove.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a new question. It has been passed upon twice—once, at least, in the National Government and once in the State of New Jersey. In the case of Senator Lot M. Morrill, of Maine, the very question was involved; and because the statute which had increased the salary of Cabinet officers, and which had been passed during the term for which he had been elected, had also been repealed, Senator Morrill was eligible to appointment in the Cabinet, although the time for which he had been elected Senator had not expired.

The New Jersey case was that of Ex-Governor George T. Werts, who was appointed to the supreme court, although his term as senator had not expired and during that term the salary had once been increased. But because the salary had been again reduced to what it had formerly been, he was deemed to be eligible to the appointment, notwithstanding a provision in the New Jersey constitution similar to the one we are now considering.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House only to state that if we pass this act and the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania should become the next Secretary of State, the constitutional provision will not have been evaded, the law will have been adapted to the constitutional provision; the Constitution will not have been violated, but deliberately complied with. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

UNOFFICIAL OPINION OF ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL RUSSELL.

FEBRUARY 10, 1909.

The question has been submitted for my unofficial opinion whether a Member of the present Senate of the United States could be appointed, after the 4th of March next, but prior to the expiration of the period for which he was elected, to the office of Secretary of State, the salary of which was increased since his election, provided Congress should in the meantime restore the salary to what it was when he entered the Senate. The question involves the construction of the Constitution of the United States (Art. I, sec. 6, par. 2), which reads as follows:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

It is a well-recognized principle of construction, frequently applied by the Supreme Court to the laws and the Constitution—as, for example, in the Legal Tender cases, the income-tax decision, and in a case (143 U. S., p. 457) involving the question whether a minister contracting to remove to the United States was prohibited from entry by the contract-labor law—that a thing may be within the law and yet without the letter of the law, and vice versa. In the decision of the first-mentioned case the Supreme Court said (12 Wall., 531):

"Nor can it be questioned that, when investigating the nature and extent of the powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress, it is indispensible to keep in view the objects for which those powers were granted. This is a universal rule of construction, applied alike to statutes, wills, contracts, and constitutions. If the general purpose of the instrument is ascertained, the language of its provisions must be construed with reference to that purpose and so as to subserve it. In no other way can the intent of the framers of the instrument be discovered. And there are more urgent reasons for looking to the ultimate purpose in examining the powers conferred by a constitution than there are in construing a statute, a will, or a contract. We do not expect to find in a constitution minute details. It is necessarily brief and comprehensive."

In the contract-labor case concerning the minister the Supreme Court used this language:

"It is a case where there was presented a definite evil, in view of which the legislature used general terms with the purpose of reaching all phases of that evil; and thereafter, unexpectedly, it is developed that the general language thus employed is broad enough to reach cases and acts which the whole history and life of the country affirm could not have been intentionally legislated against. It is the duty of the courts, under those circumstances, to say that however broad the language of the statute may be, the act, although within the letter, is not within the intention of the legislature, and therefore can not be within the statute."

Applying this familiar principle to the language of Article I, section 6, should we regard that language as prohibiting the appointment of a Senator to an office the salary of which, during the term for which he was elected, has been increased and afterwards diminished, so that at the time of his proposed appointment it is no greater than when he was elected Senator?

Is the general purpose of the language of section 6 such that to prohibit an appointment under those circumstances comes within that purpose, or, on the other hand, does the suggested appointment fall outside of the purpose and therefore outside of the law?

An examination of commentaries on the Constitution and of the debates in the convention which framed it leaves no doubt that the purpose, and the sole purpose, of paragraph 2, section 6, Article I, was to destroy the expectation a Representative or Senator might have that he would enjoy the newly created office or the newly created emoluments. (See Rawle on the Constitution, 2d ed., p. 189; Story on the Constitution, sec. 667; First Tucker's Blackstone, appendix, p. 375; Supp. to Elliott's Debates on the Constitution, pp. 189, 229, 375–378, 503–506, and 559.)

The reasons why the framers of the Constitution sought to destroy that hope was to prevent the vote of the Representative or Senator from being influenced by it. However that may have been, those in favor of the provision and those opposed to it concurred in understanding, what is manifest on the face of the provision itself, that the object, and sole object, to be accomplished was to destroy that hope.

Now, if in the case supposed here there could be no such hope, that object can not be accomplished by preventing the appointment. And certainly no such hope can exist, because, if the increase is made and continued, the Representative or Senator can not be appointed. If, on the other hand, it is made and then unmade, he can not get, or hope for, anything more than if there had been no such increase.

In my opinion, therefore, the case presented falls outside of the purpose of the law and is not within the law.

CHARLES W. RUSSELL,
Assistant Attorney-General.

The SPEAKER. All time for debate on this proposition has been exhausted.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is this bill subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not. As many as are in favor of suspending the rules and discharging the committee and passing the bill will say "aye."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 178, nays 123, answered "present" 8, not voting 77, as follows:

SAFETY OF EMPLOYEES AND TRAVELERS ON RAILROADS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 26725) to supplement an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads," which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the substitute.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the provisions of this act shall apply to every common carrier and every vehicle subject to the act of March 2, 1893, as amended April 1, 1896, and March 2, 1903, commonly known as the 'safety-appliance acts.'

"SEC. 2. That on and after July 1, 1910, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to haul, or permit to be hauled or used, on its line any car subject to the provisions of this act not equipped with appliances provided for in this act, to wit: All cars must be equipped with secure sill steps and efficient hand brakes; all cars requiring secure ladders and secure running boards shall be equipped with such ladders and running boards; and all cars having ladders shall also be equipped with secure hand holds or grab irons on their roofs at the tops of such ladders.

"SEC. 3. That within six months from the passage of this act the Interstate Commerce Commission, after hearing, shall designate the number, dimensions, location, and manner of application of the appliances provided for by section 2 of this act and section 4 of the act of March 2, 1893, as amended April 1, 1896, and shall give notice of such designation to all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act by such means as the commission may deem proper, and thereafter said number, location, dimensions, and manner of application as designated by said commission shall remain as the standards of equipment to be used on all cars subject to the provisions of this act, unless changed by an order of said Interstate Commerce Commission, to be made after full hearing and for good cause shown; and failure to comply with any such requirement of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be subject to a like penalty as failure to comply with any requirement of this act: Provided, That the Interstate Commerce Commission may, upon full hearing and for good cause, modify the requirements of this section or extend the period within which any common carrier shall comply with the provisions of this section with respect to the equipment of cars actually in service upon the date of the passage of this act.

"SEC. 4. That any common carrier subject to this act using, hauling, or permitting to be used or hauled on its line, any car subject to the requirements of this act not equipped as provided in this act shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each and every such violation, to be recovered as provided in section 6 of the act of March 2, 1893, as amended April 1, 1896.

"SEC. 5. That nothing in this act shall be held or construed to relieve any common carrier, the Interstate Commerce Commission, or any United States attorney from any of the provisions, powers, duties, liabilities, or requirements of said act of March 2, 1893, as amended by the acts of April 1, 1896, and March 2, 1903; and all of the provisions, powers, duties, requirements, and liabilities of said act of March 2, 1893, as amended by the acts of April 1, 1896, and March 2, 1903, shall apply to this act.

"SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce the provisions of this act, and all powers heretofore granted to said commission are hereby extended to it for the purpose of the enforcement of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HULL of Iowa). Is a second demanded?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering a second. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] will take their places as tellers.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 45.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Georgia to twenty minutes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to occupy very much time now further than to explain very briefly the scope and object of the pending bill. While we have a law which provides for safety devices used in the operation of railroad trains, we have no penalty prescribed by the law, and therefore it is not enforced. The proposition is to compel the equipment of cars with running-boards, ladders, hand holds, steps, and the like, so as to contribute to the safety of employees. The measure is asked for by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has discovered that it has been helpless in its effort to enforce uniformity of equipment. It is also demanded by the National Switchmen's Union of the United States, whose members perhaps have more to do with all of the appliances than any other body of railroad men. The facts are that while the Master Car Builders' Associations get together frequently and agree practically upon a uniform system of constructing cars, they nevertheless fail to go home and put that agreement into force, and the result is that every freight train in the United States, almost without exception, is made up of cars equipped with different kinds of appliances and arranged in a different manner. As a result of this, and almost entirely attributable to it, last year there were 178 men killed and over 3,000 men injured. It is thought that if we could enforce a provision compelling every railroad in the United States to equip its cars within a reasonable time in the same manner we should then avoid most, if not all, of these deaths and accidents. Is it not worth while to try? Are the lives of railroad men of so little value that we shall neglect longer to use a means of safety which even the opponents of the pending measure admit will be of much benefit, and simply because some lobbyist is not ready to O. K. the plan?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the bill include all the recommendations of the Interstate Commerce Commission and also the labor organizations on the subject?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is practically a bill which was prepared, as I understand it, under the instructions of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and so far as labor organizations have appeared before our committee, with the exception of one man, it has been indorsed by those organizations, and especially by those particular organizations which are most affected by it. There was one gentleman who appeared before the committee and stated that his organization had not acted upon this matter, but that we should take notice that for the reason that they had not asked for it, we should infer that they were opposed to it. We insisted that this measure should pass, and the gentleman claimed that we had better wait a while, although we have been waiting in this country for twenty years or more for the railroads, the Master Car Builders' Association, and the railroad employees to get together upon a uniform system. In the meanwhile crepe was being hung on the doors of thousands of our people's homes; mothers, wives, and children were mourning their slaughtered dead, and thousands of breadwinners were being crippled for life. Now, this measure does not preclude a hearing, and every man, whether a member of a labor organization or a railroad representative, has a right to appear before the commission and be heard on the proposition for standardizing these appliances.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think we ought to provide something that will protect the railroad employees from being dismissed for reporting the ill condition or illegal or dangerous condition of the cars, and is not a fear of dismissal one reason why we do not get the existing law enforced?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think not. Such a provision would not be germane to this bill. The existing law would be enforced if there were a penalty attached to it compelling the railroads to equip. There is no penalty now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the date of the existing law?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It was first enacted in 1893 and amended some years afterwards.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is the bill exactly as the Interstate Commerce Commission recommends?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; not exactly, but——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am, and I think this side of the House is, in entire ignorance of the details of this bill, and we would like to have the gentleman explain it fully. I want to help these employees to bar dangers, but I want to know how you propose to do so, so I can act intelligently.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This simply proposes a penalty and enables the commission to fix standards after a full hearing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is that all the Interstate Commerce Commission asks?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is all it asks. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will reserve the balance of my time——

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; I will yield for a question from the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the last proviso at the end of section 3——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri (continuing). Conferring upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to modify the requirements of this section by extending the period, and so forth. Do we understand by that they would have the power to modify these requirements so as to change the appliances that might be prescribed by this measure?

Mr. TOWNSEND. We make no provision as to any particular kind of appliances, only that they shall be safe. Now, the power of determining must be left with the commission, otherwise it would not be able to prescribe what might afterwards be found to be a better device or method. Furthermore, it should be discretional with it to give the railroads more time in which to equip their cars. That is left discretionary with the commission.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. I can readily see that an extension of time might be permitted, but the question is, whether you leave the power in the commission to really nullify the provisions of your bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman, What are the objections preferred by the employees against the provisions of this bill? I have never been able to learn what they are, and I would like to understand some of them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then I will say to the gentleman, the only man who appeared against it, aside from representatives of the railroads—and they were simply arguing there was an extra cost that would attach to them—was Mr. Fuller, a representative of some railroad organization, although one railroad organization was represented by Mr. Gauss, who asked for the passage of the bill. But Mr. Fuller's objection was that he did not want the commission intrusted with this power; that he was in favor of standardizing the methods of equipment by a law enacted by Congress; that he could have more influence with Congress than with the commission, so he did not want to leave it with the commission, and did not want to take the matter up now, but postpone it to some future time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Were there any specific proposed requirements of the commission to which he especially objected?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not one. There was nothing specified to the effect that anything unreasonable was asked.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will if it will not take up too much of my time.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does this bill provide for standardizing with reference to the location of the ladders on the cars?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I do not see it here.

Mr. TOWNSEND. For the arrangement of ladders, grips, hand holds, and all of those appliances, in section 2 of the bill.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I know; but the location of the ladder on the car is a very important question and one that ought to be very carefully considered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir; and that will be taken up by the commission.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does not the gentleman think that is being pushed through with undue haste? It was only reported Saturday. I am very much interested and always have been in this kind of legislation, because I represent a district in which there are many railroad men, and always try to do as near as I can what they want if it is for their good.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The committee has had hearings on this matter, and this safety-appliance provision has been discussed several times before our committee, the different hearings spreading over years of time.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The hearings that were taken before this committee are not yet printed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am stating the substance of the hearings when I say that the people directly interested, the switchmen of the country, through their organizations, are favorable to this provision, and the records show that this kind of a provision is absolutely necessary. We have waited year in and year out for the railroads to get together and adopt the master car builders' suggestions, or some other, as to the equipment of cars, because it would be infinitely better, even though the arrangement were somewhat defective, to have a uniform system rather than to have all the kinds of equipment which every train will disclose.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I fully agree with the gentleman on that. I believe in standardizing. But the switchmen are only a small proportion of the men that are directly concerned in the use of these appliances.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But they are a large proportion of the men who are directly interested in this particular kind of equipment.

Mr. DRISCOLL. But the brakemen are also interested, and I agree that the life and limbs of these men should be considered of the most importance here.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. While I am not urging this legislation, I entertain no violent hostility to its professed purposes. I demanded a second in order in all fairness to state to the House the objections that were urged by the opposition before the committee and to afford an opportunity to any of my colleagues who desire to speak in opposition to the bill to do so.

The objections, as we understood them, Mr. Speaker, are, first, that the Interstate Commerce Commission would likely adopt the plans of the Master Car Builders' Association. In support of that objection, it was cited that the President had already ordered their plan into operation on the Isthmus. I stated to the gentlemen who represented the objectors, frankly, that if the 200,000 operatives whom he professed to represent, and who were accustomed to having their limbs mangled and their lives destroyed by the operation of trains not properly equipped with uniform safety appliances, would submit to us a plan, I for one, and perhaps all of the committee, would very likely side with those who are in danger of being mangled in the course of their business, by accepting their judgment in the matter.

But the answer was that they were not ready to submit a plan, that they were not ready to have legislation, and all they insisted on now was time to consider, mature, and submit their plans. It appears to me that if it is to be left with somebody to decide what uniform plan shall be adopted, it being clear that we have not sufficient knowledge, opportunity, nor time to consider and make a decision if it were left to us, that perhaps the body constituted by law for such purposes, the Interstate Commerce Commission, ought more properly be charged with the duty; and if the personnel is not such as to secure the greatest efficiency in the discharge of the duties incumbent upon that body, the personnel can easily be reformed. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will yield to other gentlemen.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. With pleasure.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I received a letter this morning from Mr. H. R. Fuller, and I presume a large number of gentlemen have received similar letters from him, in opposition to this bill; and therefore I would like to get some information. Now, when did the hearings on this bill begin before the committee?

Mr. ADAMSON. They have been going on at different times for a long time; I can not say exactly how many months.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Can the gentleman give some idea how many days of this session have been consumed in those hearings?

Mr. ADAMSON. A good many.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will ask the gentleman whether Mr. Fuller had notice or not of the hearings that were going on in regard to this bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, my own opinion is, and I am a friend of Mr. Fuller and the 200,000 men whom he represents, that Mr. Fuller has been more courteously and liberally heard by the committee than all other men put together.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Was he heard this session on this particular bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. Time after time.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will ask the gentleman whether or not the hearings that have been had at this session have yet been printed?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know whether they have or not.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. We have not got them from the Printing Office yet.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to say to the gentleman from Indiana that Mr. Fuller is the gentleman to whom I made the statement in the committee that if he would present the plan of his constituents, which he regarded as preferable to the Master Car Builders' Association, we would favorably consider it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. He makes a statement here that the bill under consideration has been indorsed by the Switchmen's Union, which represents about 9,000 men, while he represents the vast majority of the car operators and train men who are opposed to it. He makes the statement that the bill under consideration was favored by the Master Car Builders' Association. Now, I would like to know whether or not they appeared before the committee at this session.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I suppose that those who represented their ideas did. It was not denied, I believe, that their plans were favorably regarded by supporters of the bill and were favored by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will ask the gentleman whether or not the bill under consideration would therefore or does therefore meet the approval of the Master Car Builders' Association.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is my understanding.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Just one more question. So far as the safety appliances are concerned as embraced in this bill under consideration, how does it change section 1 of the act of 1893 and the amendatory acts thereof?

Mr. ADAMSON. I would not undertake to answer that question in detail from memory. I would prefer to read the two sections before answering.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Fuller is the representative of a large number of men actually operating on trains?

Mr. ADAMSON. So he says; and I do not hesitate to repeat what I have already said, that in legislating for the safety and reliability of railroads, I would unhesitatingly regard the people who incur the danger if they would present their plans.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Fuller simply wanted a little more time to give him an opportunity to consult with the train men. Is that correct?

Mr. ADAMSON. He said that he wanted more time, until they could mature their plans; that all concerned had not yet been able to agree on the best plans.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that the railroad men who make their reports and come here and complain to the Interstate Commerce Commission would not be afraid of losing their jobs at home?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I do not know about that. They must complain to somebody.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is too experienced a lawyer not to know that they are not coming here to make complaints against their employers.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand that these 200,000 men represented by Mr. Fuller are all employees.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will tell the gentleman an experience I had about the telegraph bill. They wrote me in the utmost confidence, and one of them happened to be a boy who once came to school to me. He cautioned me thus: "Do not let anybody know about this." He was a splendid young fellow. Other telegraph men said the same thing to me. They never were afraid if they filed any complaints against the railroad company they would lose their jobs. Now, is there anything in this bill to allow these people to come here and lodge complaints and to punish the railroad official who discharges a man for doing so?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think that is in this bill, I am sorry to say.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wish it did have such a provision.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much time have I consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed eight minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield five minutes, or such time as he desires, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, about an hour ago I preferred a very reasonable request in this House, and that was that we have an hour on a side to debate that Knox proposition. The floor leader of the Republicans [Mr. PAYNE] very promptly objected, as I think, on a tip from the Speaker.

When I was elected to the position that I occupy in this House the newspapers wanted to know whether I was going to pursue tactics of general obstruction. I said "No;" that a general policy of obstruction was idiotic; that nobody had ever pursued such a course; but that when we were maltreated I proposed to pursue that course to an extent sufficient to stop such imposition, and I am going to do it now until we consume two hours of time. This is fair notice to everybody in the House that every time there is an attempt at imposition on the minority I will find some way to even up. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I want to know what he means by the "Knox bill."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, the bill to make Senator KNOX Secretary of State, which we had up and defeated a short time ago under suspension of the rules and which I hear we will have up again in a few minutes under a special rule.

Mr. COCKRAN. The bill that knocks the Constitution. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, I hope we will have a fair understanding about such things as that.

As far as this bill is concerned, I have not had time to read it, and nobody else has had any time to read it except the members of the committee and my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who reads everything. I want to say that I think he is a very valuable adjunct to this body. [Applause.]

The hearings on this bill have never been printed, and if we wanted to inform ourselves about it we have not had any chance to do it. I am opposed to that sort of legislation under any circumstances or at any time. I do not know whether this is a good bill or a bad one, and nobody else knows, except the members of the committee.

Mr. SULZER. Fuller says it is a bad bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will come to that in a minute. I want to read a couple of telegrams and Mr. Fuller's letter. The first telegram runs as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, February 15, 1909.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Congressman, Washington, D. C.:

More than 200,000 members of train and enginemen's organizations oppose passage of Watson bill (H. R. 26725) as reported, and favor passage of Rodenberg concurrent resolution No. 63 as substitute therefor.

W. S. STONE.

Here is another telegram:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, February 14, 1909.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Washington, D. C.:

More than 200,000 members of train and enginemen's organizations oppose passage of Watson bill (H. R. 26725) as reported, and favor passage of Rodenberg concurrent resolution No. 63 as substitute therefor.

W. G. LEE,
Grand Master Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen.

Here is the letter from Mr. Fuller that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] was asking about:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 14, 1909.

Hon. WILLIAM B. WILSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, and Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and representing 230,000 railroad employees, I respectfully solicit your cooperation and assistance in our efforts to prevent the passage of the Watson bill (H. R. 26725) to supplement the safety-appliance act, which bill was reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce yesterday, and which, it is thought, will be called up in the House to-morrow, February 15.

This legislation was primarily sought by the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and its purpose is to force the adoption of the Master Car Builders' Association's standards regarding hand brakes, sill steps, ladders, and running boards upon freight cars, some of which standards are objectionable and dangerous to the brakemen and switchmen of the country, for it directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the standards, and it is well known that the secretary, who is the officer in charge of the enforcement of the safety-appliance law, has repeatedly declared that the master car builders' standards should be the law, and the commission itself is also committed to them.

It is true this measure has received the indorsement of the Switchmen's Union, but that organization represents but a small minority of the employees directly affected, its membership being limited to 9,000 switchmen, whereas the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, which organization is opposed to its passage, has a membership of 28,000 switchmen and also represents a large majority of the organized brakemen of the United States, all of whom are vitally interested, and who are not asking for the passage of this bill.

We appeared before the committee and gave what we believed were good reasons why this bill should not be passed, and we think the Members of the House should be permitted to read the testimony before being compelled to vote upon it; yet, as we understand it, it is the intention to bring the matter to a vote before the testimony is printed.

That has been done.

We do not object to, but, in fact, favor the ultimate standardizing of these appliances, but there is a difference of opinion among the employees themselves as to their dimensions and location, and until there are some prospects of agreement among the men we believe any legislation which either fixes or authorizes or requires the fixing of these standards is both premature and unwise and should not be passed.

Yours, truly,

H. R. FULLER,
National Legislative Representative.

I want to say this to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]: I think he ought to withdraw this bill for the present and give us a chance to investigate it, because nobody knows whether it is good or bad. If we find it to be a good bill, we would all vote for it, for everybody knows that a good bill on this subject ought to pass.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. SULZER. I should like a minute.

Mr. ADAMSON. I should like to accommodate the gentleman, but I have promised all my time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] asked to be recognized, and so did the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. I can only yield the time between them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I have tried perhaps as many accident cases against railroads in my time as any Member of this House, and I claim to have some personal knowledge from experience and observation as to how accidents happen to men in the running service.

Syracuse, N. Y., my home, in the center of the district which I have the honor to represent, is a large railroad center, and in East Syracuse are perhaps the largest railroad and freight yards in the world. There is a large number of railroad men engaged in all grades of the service living in my district, and they are always interested in legislation of this character. They generally come to me when interested in any railroad matter which affects them, and we talk it over, and while I make no definite promises, I always feel disposed to interest myself in their behalf and for legislation in which they are interested, if I think it is fair and proper legislation; and every provision and improvement which will have a tendency to save the lives and limbs of men should have the most careful and thoughtful consideration; and nothing which will not accomplish that end should be hastily or immaturely enacted into law by the Congress or put into the form of controlling regulation by any department or official of the Government.

I agree with the committee that the safety appliances referred to in the bill should be standardized, if they can be. But there is one part of it I do not think can well be standardized. In the western country, where land is cheap and plentiful, and where the tracks are far apart, they may be able to put the tracks so far apart that the ladders may be placed on the sides instead of the ends of the cars. But in the East, where tracks have been established for a long time, and where they are closer together, it is very likely that ladders must be placed on the ends of the cars; because if placed on the sides, they will be so close to other cars running by, and so close to the sides of tunnels and the abutments of bridges and to telegraph and telephone poles and other obstructions, that men in climbing up and down on the sides of the cars would be apt to be swept off and injured or killed. Aside from these obstructions and resulting dangers it would be much better to have all the ladders on the sides; but I take it that on account of these present difficulties the ladders may be placed, in the eastern part of the country, on the ends of the cars rather than the sides; and this is a matter which deserves very careful attention before it is finally decided upon by Congress or the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It is an easy matter to standardize the sill steps, and it strikes me that it would not be very difficult to standardize efficient hand brakes. Also it would be easy enough, in my judgment, to standardize running boards. This bill provides for the standardizing of secure hand holds or grip irons on the roofs of the cars and at the tops of the ladders. But it does not provide for their position with reference to the tops of the ladders, and it strikes me, from experience and observation, that they should be placed some considerable distance from the top, in order that men may climb up and get on top of the cars with less danger of accidents.

This bill was introduced on January 19, but no Member of Congress can possibly examine all the bills and familiarize himself with them. If he can keep track of the bills reported and which are of interest to his constituents, he is doing pretty well. This bill was only reported last Saturday, February 13, and to-day, Monday, it is being pushed through the House with only twenty minutes' debate on either side and under suspension of the rules, with no chance to amend. The hearings before the committee on this particular matter have not yet been printed, and the Members interested have not had an opportunity to examine the evidence and form a deliberate conclusion with reference to the merits of this bill. The railroad organizations throughout the country have not had a fair chance to examine this bill and to submit their views to their Representatives in Congress, a privilege and opportunity which they always should have, because they are the people most interested in this measure.

I am aware that the Master Car Builders' Association is interested and the railroad companies are interested, but the parties most vitally concerned are the men who have to use those appliances by day and night and whose lives and limbs are in danger if they are structurally defective or out of order.

It seems to me that this bill should not be crowded through in this way; that all men concerned in this legislation should have an opportunity to consider it carefully and deliberately, and perhaps they could agree among themselves, or their Representatives can agree, as to just how these various safety appliances should be standardized and perhaps improved in such manner as to result in a mutual benefit to the car builders and the men. I oppose this bill not because I have heard from the railway organizations in my district, but because I have not heard from them and they have not had an opportunity to express their judgment about it. If the several organizations who are interested in this legislation can not agree, or substantially agree, as to the manner of this standardizing, then that will have to be done by some other authority. But they ought to have a chance to come together and agree on this matter, if possible. Therefore I believe the bill ought not pass to-day. I shall vote against it, and hope it may be defeated.

Mr. ADAMSON. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, there is a German adage that "The better is the worst enemy of the best." No greater harm can be done legislation in favor of safety appliances than by the hurried passage of ill-digested, ill-considered, and insufficient legislation. Upon it hangs the lives of millions of operatives and tens of millions of travelers and passengers upon our railroad trains. I do not charge that this legislation is ill considered, nor so state, but it is manifest that it is hurried. We have had no opportunity to examine the hearings. We have had no opportunity to investigate this question for ourselves. Suppose this pernicious practice of bringing bills into the House were usual, what would be the use of hearings? We do not sit here as a high court; we simply sit to confirm what the committee has done? We are entitled to have these hearings, and without these hearings shall we fly deliberately and in the face of 250,000 railroad men, every one of whom holds his life as a hostage to his honesty and disinterestedness in his opposition to this legislation. And I maintain that this great army of brave and faithful men—a quarter of a million railway engineers and firemen, whose lives and limbs are daily and hourly imperiled by any mistake we may make—shall be fully and fairly heard.

Mr. ADAMSON. I now yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I realize that probably this bill will not pass under this motion to suspend the rules. It is unfortunate that this is the situation. When the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Kentucky, however, seek to hide behind the proposition that the hearings have not been printed, it makes me smile. For more than a year we have had hearings printed on the subject which neither gentleman has ever seen or read. If we had printed bushels of hearings, they would know no more about those than about the one we printed a year ago. The present bill is the outgrowth of hearings we had a long time ago, and which we did have printed.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. MANN. I can not yield; my time is too short. I do not criticise the gentleman; he has not seen the hearings printed a year ago.

Mr. STANLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I have seen them.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman has seen them. Then the gentleman has no excuse for opposing the bill. [Laughter.] I realize, however, that a certain gentleman now sitting in the gallery of the House is seeking to direct the destinies of this House through claiming that he represents 230,000 trainmen in the country. I hope that upon his conscience, if this bill be defeated, will rest the agony of knowing that he is the cause of the death of many a man on the train, that he has cut the leg off many a switchman and many a trainman, that he has deprived many a man of his arm, and that he has made many an orphan and many a widow.

The whole purpose of this bill is to have the hand brake, the ladders, the stirrups, and the safety appliances which every brakeman and switchman is required to use look all alike, so that the man who becomes accustomed to swinging onto a car, who swings on without stopping to look, can do so without looking to see just how they are placed. The bill is asked for by a great majority of the trainmen of the country, who are not in this particular represented by Mr. Fuller. It is true gentlemen here receive telegrams from persons at home who do not know anything about what the bill is. The bill is asked for by the American Federation of Labor. Remember that. It is asked for by the Order of Railroad Conductors. Remember that.

It is asked for by the Switchmen's Union. Remember that. It is asked for by decency and humanity. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] says they want the ladders on the side on the western cars, where the tracks are wider. We want the ladders at the same place on every car, because western cars come east and eastern cars go west, and when a man seeks to swing himself onto a car he ought to feel that he will find the ladder where he expects it and not become accustomed to using the ladder on the side and then fall between the cars because the ladder is on the end. It does not make any great difference where these appliances are placed. Some men want them in one place and some want them in another place. Doubtless each has equally good arguments, but the point is that if they can all be placed in the same place uniformly on the cars, it will save human life. The only real objection that has been made to the bill was made by the railroad companies, who said it would cost them money to change these appliances, and we did not consider that a sufficient objection. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I assume that it will not be of any avail for me to discuss this matter further with gentlemen who have been influenced and who will be influenced, not by the merits of the case, but by telegrams and special-delivery letters which have been sent out for the purpose, not of enlightening the Congress, but of prejudicing Members who are to vote. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has read a letter in which the writer states that some of the provisions of the Master Car Builders' Association are not satisfactory to some of these alleged leaders of railroad men. The fact of the matter is that there are all kinds of methods now employed. The object of this bill is to make one uniform system, and the gentleman who has sent out the special letters stated before our committee that his organizations had given him no instructions on this subject. I submit that when any man states that 250,000 men in this country are opposed to this measure he is stating an absolute falsehood. There are not that number who even know about it. One of the representatives of the trainmen, Mr. Goss, appeared before our committee in favor of this bill and claimed to be representing the railroad men of his organization in his testimony, so that it is certainly clear that not all the railroad men are opposing the measure.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is not Mr. Goss a representative of the conductors?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. They have nothing to do with these appliances one way or the other.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not know how they run a railroad, I guess.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that a representative of the switchmen's organization and also a representative of the national conductors' order appeared before our committee favoring the bill, but outside of any influence of this kind there comes to us at this moment the question of whether we will aid in preserving life—whether we are going to do something that will lessen the number of accidents. We are not tying the hands of anybody for all time to come. We simply say that within six months the commission shall have full hearings, at which all gentlemen interested may appear and present their reasons in favor or in opposition, and the commission is also authorized to make more liberal its findings and to extend the time during which they shall be put in operation. But, Mr. Speaker, this is a righteous measure. There is nothing in opposition to it except jealousy and selfishness. I know what I am talking about. The gentleman in his letter says that he is in favor of standardizing some method to be used in place of the various methods now employed.

This bill will do that. This bill enables the commission to obtain all of the information which is necessary, and if these gentlemen are as active in presenting facts to the commission as they are in trying to prejudice this Congress and to create cowards who will not dare to act upon what their judgment dictates to be in the best interests of the country [applause]—if that is true, Mr. Speaker, if that is to be maintained, then I say, with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the blood——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. TOWNSEND (continuing). Of these slaughtered men must be upon their heads.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman refer to Members of Congress by the use of that term?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I am not referring to any specific Congressman in this matter, and I certainly would not refer to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], but I do state this: If gentlemen, without any other reason than the receipt of telegrams or letters, vote against this measure, it seems to me that they have not properly considered their duties as Members of Congress. This bill was reported unanimously by the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. The reasons that the hearings were not printed were, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, because we have had hearings from time to time, and one gentleman after another has appeared, and time has been asked for, and the committee has been most liberal in granting it. So it has been running along from day to day, but the report of all the hearings has been fairly stated. I do not think anybody will dispute it, and with this statement, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the bill ought to pass.

Mr. COOK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SULZER and Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia) there were—ayes 150, noes 51.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the yeas and nays. As many as favor calling the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Seven gentleman have arisen, not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

SALARY OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following report (H. Rept. No. 2163) from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits the following report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 566.

Resolved, That the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress be, and hereby is, discharged from the consideration of the bill (S. 9295) in relation to the salary of the Secretary of State, and that the said bill shall at once be considered in the House, with forty minutes of debate to be divided between those favoring and those opposing the said bill, at the end of which debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill to a final passage without intervening motion or appeal.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill referred to in the resolution just reported is the bill which was debated and voted upon by the House within the last two hours. At the beginning of business to-day the gentleman from West Virginia, chairman of the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives, moved to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill, a bill relating to the salary of the Secretary of State. It was debated for forty minutes, a yea-and-nay vote was taken; and the result was that there were—yeas 179, nays 123. It is apparent, therefore, that it is the wish of the House that the bill should pass, and, pursuant to the wish of the House, expressed by this vote, the Committee on Rules have reported this rule, making it in order to consider now the same bill with twenty minutes' debate on either side, at the end of which time the previous question is to be considered as ordered and a vote taken.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand from the reading of the rule whether the twenty minutes' debate on either side is to be on the adoption of the rule or on the adoption of the bill after the rule shall have been adopted.

Mr. DALZELL. The rule permits a debate of twenty minutes on a side on the adoption of the bill itself. I now ask for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 115, noes 99.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, upon this question I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands tellers.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, we might as well have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 123, answered "present" 5, not voting 116, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CANNON, and he voted "yea."

So the resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. CHANEY with Mr. KITCHIN.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio with Mr. HACKETT.

Mr. BARTHOLDT with Mr. WEISSE.

For the balance of the day:

Mr. CARY with Mr. MCDERMOTT.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, the opposition to this bill is based upon the proposition that it may affect the eligibility, or remove the ineligibility, of a distinguished Member of the Senate to an office in the Cabinet of the incoming President. The qualifications of that gentleman are so preeminent that the desire for his appointment far exceeds any desire on his part to hold the office. The constitutional provision is that—

> No Senator or Representative shall during the time for which he was elected be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

The judicial, legislative, and executive appropriation bill passed in 1907 increased the salaries of certain officers of the Government, including that of the Secretary of State, whose salary was increased from $8,000 to $12,000 per annum. This bill, if passed, will repeal the act which created that increase in salary and restore it to $8,000, which had been the salary of all Cabinet officers for many years prior to 1907.

I maintain that this pending measure if enacted will be not an evasion of, but in compliance with, the constitutional provision to which I have referred. In support of that proposition I have some precedents and some authorities which, in the arrangement of an orderly argument, I should keep until the last, but which, owing to the shortness of the time allowed me, I shall refer to at the outset so that they may not be overlooked.

In the first place, I will call attention to the provision of the constitution of the State of Indiana:

> That no person elected to any judicial office shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, be eligible to any office of trust or profit in the State other than a judicial office.

A gentleman who held a judicial office was elected for a second term. Before the first term expired he was elected to another office not judicial in its character and for which he was at the time of his election ineligible under the language of the constitution. He declined the election to the judicial office the second term, and refused to qualify. His election to the nonjudicial office took place, however, twenty-two days before the expiration of his first term.

He endeavored to administer the duties of the nonjudicial office, and legal proceedings were instituted to determine his right. The trial court held him ineligible under the constition, because he had been clearly so at the time of his election. But the supreme court, the highest court under the constitution of that State, held, in Smith v. Moore, reported in Ninetieth Indiana State Reports, at page 274, that the ineligibility was removed; first, by his declination to serve the second judicial term, and by the expiration of the first term after his election before the term of the nonjudicial office had begun. That decision, as applied to this case, Mr. Speaker, holds that a constitutional ineligibility may be constitutionally removed, and that the question of eligibility is to be determined as of the time when the appointment is made or attempted to be made according to the conditions as they then exist and not as they may have existed during some previous period of time.

Now, here is a precedent from the State of New Jersey. The constitution of that State is even more stringent than that of the Federal Constitution. It says:

> That no member of the senate or general assembly shall, during the time for which he was elected, be nominated—
> Be nominated—
> or appointed by the governor or by the legislature in joint meeting to any civil office under the authority of this State which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

A former governor of that State, George T. Werts, being a member of the state senate, had voted for an increase in the salaries of the supreme judges. Before the expiration of his senatorial term it was desired that he should be elevated to the bench. The legislature thereupon reduced the salary to the original figure. Thereupon he was appointed, accepted, and served. No question was ever raised as to his right to serve nor as to the validity of his judicial acts.

There is a still more important precedent, to which I now call attention. The case is on all fours with the question under consideration here. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] was about to refer to it this morning when the gavel fell.

Lot M. Morrill, of the State of Maine, was, in 1871, elected a member of the United States Senate. When a member of that body there was passed the act of March 3, 1873, which may be found in the Seventeenth Statutes at Large, page 486, increasing the salary of Members of Congress, Senators, Cabinet officers, the President, and others.

It increased the salaries of Cabinet officers from $8,000 to $10,000 per annum. In the succeeding year, by the act of 1874 (18 Stat. L., 4), that increase was repealed as to some of the offices, and it was enacted that the salaries of Cabinet officers—

> Shall be as fixed by the law in force at the time of the passage of said increasing act.

That is exactly what it is now proposed to do—make the salary of the Secretary of State precisely what it was before the passage of the act of 1907 making the increase.

This volume which I hold in my hand is the executive register of the United States, 1789–1902. On page 203 this entry appears, under the caption "Secretary of the Treasury:"

> Lot M. Morrill, of Maine, nominated, confirmed, and commissioned June 21, 1876; entered upon his duties July 7, 1876; served through the remainder of the administration.

During the term in the Senate to which he had been elected in 1871, and during the same term in which the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury had been increased from $8,000 to $10,000 in 1873, and reduced again to $8,000 in 1874, Mr. Morrill was nominated by President Grant to be Secretary of the Treasury; the nomination was confirmed by the Senate; he was commissioned, accepted, and served.

There were in the Senate at that time such eminent constitutional lawyers as George F. Edmunds, of Vermont; Roscoe Conkling, of New York; George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts; and upon the other side of the Chamber such lawyers as Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware; Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio; William Pinkney Whyte, of Maryland; William A. Wallace, a distinguished lawyer from Pennsylvania, as well as others whom I need not stop to name. Not one of them had the slightest doubt of the eligibility of Mr. Morrill after the salary of the office had been restored to its original figure. None of them, so far as the RECORD discloses, offered a single objection to his confirmation, which, I believe, was unanimous in the Senate. To-day gentlemen, it seems to me, raise questions which are not worthy to be propounded, and make arguments unworthy of lawyers who are as well versed in the Constitution as some of these gentlemen are.

How do we construe a constitution? Why, the same as we do a statute. We consider first the old law, then the mischief, and then the remedy. Now, what was the old law? Why, there was no restraint upon the eligibility of Members of either branch to offices created by Congress, or the acceptance of salaries increased by Congress during their terms. It was urged in the constitutional debates on this proposition (I have the volume here) that in England great scandal had arisen from the fact that members aspired to Parliament for the very purpose of securing by their influence the creation of new offices, new embassies, new consulships, and other positions which they hoped to fill, and that they increased the salaries of positions to which they hoped to be appointed. Mr. Madison stated that even in his own State of Virginia he had noticed the undue favoritism of the legislature to its own membership. That was the mischief; the proposed remedy, the prevention of Members of either branch of Congress from accepting any office which during their membership that body had created or the emoluments of which it had increased.

The mischief certainly did not extend to a condition like this, where if an appointment is made from the present United States Senate to the Cabinet of the incoming President for the position of Secretary of State, the salary will not have been increased, but will be precisely the same salary that it was before the act of 1907 was passed. [Applause.] The case then will not be at all within the mischief and, by fair and rational construction, not within the remedy found in the constitutional provision.

Upon the question of constitutional construction, let me read you a few authorities.

I have here a monograph on "Constitutional Construction and Interpretation," prepared from a review of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States construing and applying the Federal Constitution, by Thomas H. Calvert, from which I quote the following propositions:

> Upon the examination of every question of construction the great leading intent of the Constitution must be kept constantly in view, and it must be interpreted according to its true intent and meaning.

Which proposition is sustained by reference to numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which, upon a hasty examination, I find are clearly in point.

And again:

> If the general purpose of the instrument is ascertained, the language of its provisions must be construed with reference to that purpose and so as to conserve it.

Which proposition, also, is abundantly sustained by citations from decisions of our highest court.

And again:

> The Constitution, establishing a frame of government, declaring fundamental principles and creating a national sovereignty, is not to be interpreted with the strictness of a code of laws or of a private contract.

Then, we find this:

> Mischief to be remedied. In placing a construction upon any clause or part thereof, the mischief existing in the old law or conditions should be ascertained, and the clause construed as affording a remedy.

Innumerable decisions of the Supreme Court are cited in support of these several propositions, and if any gentleman cares to take the time to examine them, he will find that every authority cited is directly in point.

In Sutherland, one of the best works on construction, second edition, section 115, the following is laid down by the learned author:

> The courts with great unanimity enforce this constitutional restriction in all cases falling within the mischiefs intended thereby to be remedied. And, in cases not within those mischiefs, they construe it literally to give convenient and necessary freedom, so far as is compatible with the remedial measure, to the law-making power. They agree that whilst it is necessary to so expound this provision as to prevent the evils it was designed to remove, it is no less desirable to avoid the opposite extreme.

Apply those principles to the constitutional provision under discussion and we have no difficulty. The framers of the Constitution never for one moment intended that any Member of either branch of Congress should during the time of office for which he was elected be prevented from appointment to any office not created by Congress during the term and the salary of which was not greater than when his term of office began. Such a case was not within any mischief which Mr. Madison or any other of the framers of the Constitution had in mind. There could, in fact, be no mischief in such a situation or in an appointment to office under such conditions.

In the Legal Tender cases, reported in Tenth Wallace, Mr. Justice Strong, appointed from Pennsylvania, and who had previously served in the supreme court of that State, said:

> Nor can it be questioned that, when investigating the nature and extent of the powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress, it is indispensable to keep in view the objects for which those powers were granted. This is a universal rule of constructions, applied alike to statutes, wills, contracts, and constitutions. If the general purpose of the instrument is ascertained, the language of its provisions must be construed with reference to that purpose and so as to subserve it. In no other way can the intent of the framers of the instrument be discovered. And there are more urgent reasons for looking to the ultimate purpose in examining the powers conferred by a constitution than there are in construing a statute, a will, or a contract.

If any gentleman will take the trouble to read the decision of the Supreme Court in Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, reported in Eleventh Peters at page 257, he will find it to be a case in which the Supreme Court by its construction very clearly limited and restricted the language of the Constitution so as to cover only the mischief for which the court found the Constitution had intended to provide a remedy. The Constitution provides that—

> No State shall * * * emit bills of credit.

But the court, finding that the mischief was that before the adoption of the Constitution the States issued bills which circulated as money on the credit of the issuing State, by interpretation limited the language to providing against that mischief. The construction placed upon it by the court did not permit the prohibition to be extended to other matters, which might in some sense be termed "bills of credit."

In the so-called "contract-labor" case of the Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, found in Thirty-sixth Lawyer's Edition of the Opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, page 226, the Supreme Court unanimously held, as stated in the syllabus, that—

> A thing may be within the letter of the statute and yet not within the statute, because not within its spirit nor within the intention of the makers.

The opponents of this measure really make no argument. They simply point to the words, "shall have been increased during such time." They say that the salary was increased in 1907, and that, although it may be reduced again in 1909, the fact can not be avoided that there was an increase in 1907. The letter of the law, they say, renders a Senator of 1907 ineligible to appointment during the term for which he was elected. They give us no reason; they attempt no construction; they say that they cling to the words of the Constitution. There is, Mr. Speaker, an apt scriptural quotation which I heard fall from your lips in a recent parliamentary ruling: "The letter killeth, but the spirit maketh alive." That is an equivalent for the legal maxim usually quoted in Latin, but which being interpreted means, "He who sticks to the letter, sticks in the bark."

I maintain that even the letter, fairly interpreted, would not apply to this case. After this act is passed it can not be said that the salary of the Secretary of State has been increased, for the salary will then be precisely the same as it had existed for many years prior to the senatorial term which any member of that body was serving in 1907. No authority has been cited, none can be cited, nor any respectable precedent, in opposition to the position we take in this matter. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that at the solemn joint assemblage held in this Hall on Wednesday last it had been officially declared that Mr. Bryan and not Mr. Taft had been elected President; suppose it had become known that Mr. Bryan proposed to appoint some eminent gentleman from the Senate or my friend from Missouri, for instance, Mr. CLARK, to a Cabinet position; and suppose that which is unsupposable, that this Republican Congress had been so mean that it wanted to embarrass the incoming Democratic administration, or that it had some feeling against some Member of either House whom that Democratic President desired to appoint to the head of any of the executive departments; and then suppose that this Republican Congress should to-day pass an act increasing the salaries of all Cabinet officers; suppose that it should next week repeal that act—would any gentleman upon that side of the Chamber be found either before or after or upon the 4th of March contending that by that procedure the whole body of Senators and the entire membership of the House of Representatives had been rendered ineligible to appointment?

Would not every gentleman upon that side of the Chamber then hold, as I hold now and as the authorities hold and the precedents establish, that the question of eligibility must be determined by conditions as they may exist at the time of the appointment? Would they not hold, as I now hold, that the constitutional provision is not to be given a narrow, petty, unfair, technical construction, at variance with all the rules of construction to which from the very foundation of the Government the courts have adhered? Would they not hold, as I hold, that it can not be made to extend beyond the mischief which the framers of the Constitution had in mind and applied to a situation wholly outside of that mischief—to a situation entirely free from mischief and to which no one inside or outside of the Constitutional Convention ever intended or dreamed that it should be made to apply?

But, Mr. Speaker, this whole discussion is academic. This question of eligibility is one over which this House has no jurisdicton. The Secretaryship of State is one of those positions to which the Constitution specifically provides that the President "shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint." Before that office can be filled there must be a nomination. Then there must be the advice and consent of the Senate, and only after that can the appointment be made by the President.

While the question of eligibility after the passage of this act is one upon which I entertain no doubt whatever, it is, nevertheless, one which the House of Representatives can not determine. That question is for another body, whose view of the matter may be inferred from the fact that it has sent this bill to us by an unanimous vote. The bill itself, simply repealing the act of 1907, in so far as it applies to this particular office, is clearly within the power of the House to pass. No gentleman denies that. Let us then proceed, leaving it to our newly elected President, himself a lawyer of renown and a jurist of great distinction, to make any nomination he sees fit, and to the Senate to pass upon any nomination he may make. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I submit that this House may safely and constitutionally enact this bill to-day, and the future, I think, may safely be left to take care of itself. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania acted wisely in going to New Jersey for a precedent for the proposed legislation. He could hardly have found a violation of constitutional law on so slight a ground outside of New Jersey, not even in a South American republic. [Laughter.] The only respectable authority or precedent that has been presented to bolster up the other side of this case is the Morrill case. But gentlemen must remember that that case never got into a court of justice, and never judicially was passed upon. Gentlemen must furthermore remember that Senator Morrill was confirmed by the Senate acting under "Senatorial courtesy," which, so far as I can learn, overrides all sorts of bars, constitutional and otherwise.

Mr. Speaker, this is a clear, plain, palpable, obvious, manifest case of a violation of a direct and express constitutional inhibition which attaches upon the happening of certain facts. These facts have happened, and not even the Parliament of Great Britain, much less the Congress of the United States, can repeal a fact.

Now, gentlemen take the position that by repeal they can do away with the motive, corrupt or possibly corrupt in the opinion of our forefathers, contrary to public policy at any rate, in the mind of a Senator; that they have answered the need of the case. The Constitution does not say that a Senator who votes for an increase shall be prohibited from holding certain offices, but that any Senator who is a member of the Senate that votes for the increase during his term shall be prohibited. Thus it is not a question of motives. It is a question of public policy. Nobody questions Senator KNOX's motive.

But, if their position were correct, you do not take away the motive in this case by the repeal; not even then. If you pass this repealing act, then, upon the same logical principles that support it, assuming for the moment that they are logical, Congress would have the right upon the 5th of March to restore the salary of the Secretary of State to the figure that it is now degraded from.

If Congress did not want to do that because it wanted to make a show of obeying the spirit of the Constitution, it could, and probably would, wait until two years had expired and the period of the term of Senator KNOX, in the Senate, had expired, and then restore the salary to the figure provided in the late act, which we are now repealing. So that the only difference would be this: Instead of the Senator getting an increase of salary for four years, he would get it for two years—precisely the same in principle, though different in degree.

Mr. Speaker, this is a case where an inhibition attaches on the happening of certain facts. Those facts have happened. That salary has been increased by that Senate of which Mr. KNOX was a member and during the term for which he was elected. It makes no difference whether it shall subsequently be decreased or not any more than it makes any difference whether—which will probably be the case—it shall be subsequently reincreased. The Constitution expresses a broad general policy. If gentlemen will pardon me, I will read a line from a speech made by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] this morning, which seems to me to express the fact:

> The people and Mr. KNOX can not be placed in statu quo by passing this bill. The object of the clause of the Constitution in question was, according to that great judge, Story, "to take away, as far as possible, any improper bias in the vote of the Representative and to secure to the constituents some solemn pledge of disinterestedness." The repeal of the law increasing the salary at this time, two years after its enactment, can not affect the motives of the interest or noninterest of the Senator at the time the bill was passed. We can not know, nor can we inquire, nor does it matter, what a Senator's motives were in voting for an increase of the emoluments or the creation of a new office, and therefore the fathers, when they framed the Constitution, pronounced in that instrument the irrebuttable disqualification the moment the offending event happened.

You can not repeal a fact, whatever other power of repeal you may have. Now, gentlemen, early in the history of the country a certain elector from the State of Michigan was disqualified because a man was a deputy postmaster. There was appointed a committee to report to the Senate. Amongst them was Felix Grundy, of Tennessee, Henry Clay, of Kentucky, and Silas Wright, jr., of New York. I need not dwell, because I have not the time, upon the ability of these men. They reported:

> The committee are of the opinion that the second section of the second article of the Constitution, which declares that "no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector," ought to be carried in its whole spirit into the rigid execution, in order to prevent officers of the General Government from bringing their official power to influence the election of President and Vice-President of the United States.

Furthermore, they say that a resignation—mark you now, of the office of deputy postmaster—that "resignation would not entitle him to vote as an elector under the Constitution." On February 4 these resolutions were considered and were agreed to by the House and by the Senate. In other words, the ineligibility had attached and that was the end of it. This case, unlike the Morrill case, was not passed over sub silentio.

Here is an opinion from Attorney-General Brewster in the Kirkwood case. Kirkwood was elected and qualified as Senator from Iowa for a term which would expire in March, 1883. He resigned in March, 1881. Keep that in mind. He resigned in March, 1881, to accept the position of Secretary of the Interior, which office he also resigned in the latter part of the same year. "Since then"—mark that "since then," I am reading from Brewster's opinion—"by act of May 15, 1882, the office of tariff commissioner was created." "Advised: That the second clause of section 6 of the first article of the Constitution disqualifies Kirkwood for appointment to such office."

That is a case where the man was a Member of the Senate and elected to it and had resigned from it before the Senate voted to create the office to which he was to be appointed, and yet Attorney-General Brewster promptly ruled that he was disqualified because he had been elected a member of the body which, after his resignation, created the office, and he uses this language:

> It is not necessary to consider the question of the policy which occasioned this constitutional prohibition. It must be controlled exclusively by the positive terms of the provision of the Constitution. The language is precise and clear in my opinion, and disables him from receiving the appointment.

Mr. Speaker, I had not proposed to say a word upon this question. Nobody appreciates more than I do the appearance, at any rate, of ungraciousness in the opposition to this measure. I am perfectly willing for Judge Taft to have whomsoever he pleases in his Cabinet. I would be glad to see him get Mr. KNOX there if he wants him, provided he gets him without my complicity, but I am, as a Member of the House, forced to vote; and, because this question was referred to the Committee on Rules, of which I am a member, I have been forced to make a short speech.

What I have said is not all. I would like to have some of you examine the Hill case, which went to the supreme court of the State of Washington, in Second Washington. In the territorial statutes there was a provision that no officer of the United States Army should hold any civil office there. Desirous that Hill, who was an officer of the United States, should hold an office, the legislature repealed the statute in order that he might be given the office. The case went to the supreme court of the State, and the supreme court ruled that his ineligibility had attached, as a matter of fact, and it could not be removed.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I occupied?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. Before I sit down I want to express my regret to Members to whom I had promised time. I thought I would talk only about two or three minutes.

Upon that supposition I had parceled the time out, and I find I shall have to cut it short of what I promised. I did not know I was occupying so much time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am a personal friend of Judge Taft. I wish him success and happiness in his presidential career. I think, as I said in my former remarks, that he has a right to select anybody for his Cabinet that he desires, provided the man has the qualifications fixed by the Constitution; but he has no right, moral or legal, to appoint to his Cabinet or to any other office a man who is disqualified by constitutional provision as is Senator KNOX. I said about three hours ago in this presence that the real thing which this bill attempts to do is unconstitutional. A few years ago our lamented friend Timothy Campbell, of New York, of blessed memory, startled the country and set it in a roar by propounding the immortal question to President Cleveland. "What is the Constitution betwixt friends?" I say that Tim Campbell stands vindicated as a great constitutional lawyer if we pass this bill. [Applause and laughter.] I have never undertaken to exploit myself as a constitutional lawyer, and in view of the way in which certain constitutional lawyers are speaking and acting, I am glad that I have not; but I do claim to understand plain English, and the plain English in this case bars Senator KNOX from the Secretaryship of State. I have no objection to Mr. KNOX being Secretary of State if he can qualify, but he stands, if he is made Secretary of State, third in the line to the presidential succession. He is disqualified for the Presidency until March 4, 1911, when his present term expires, for two reasons. The first is because he is disqualified to be Secretary of State, and the second is that during the senatorial term which he is now serving the emoluments of the President of the United States have been increased by the law enacted by the Fifty-ninth Congress, and during the senatorial term for which Mr. KNOX was elected, giving the President $25,000 per annum for traveling expenses. He is likely to be disqualified for a third reason, and that is that the bill now pending in the Senate to increase the salary of the President of the United States is almost certain to be passed. I say that no man can afford to be inducted into the office of President of the United States, and the American people can not afford to have him inducted into that office, when there rests upon his title to it the slightest cloud. [Applause.]

Clearly Senator KNOX is ineligible to the Presidency prior to March 4, 1911, because the President's "emoluments" were increased by the law enacted during the senatorial term which Senator KNOX is now serving, giving the President $25,000 per annum for traveling expenses. Should the Congress undertake to qualify Senator KNOX for the Presidency by repealing the statute giving that extra $25,000 per annum, or should the Congress, flying in the face of all the lexicographers, in its mania for qualifying Senator KNOX, enact a law declaring that the $25,000 allowance for traveling expenses did not increase the "emoluments" of the President, he would still be ineligible to the Presidency prior to the expiration of his senatorial term, March 4, 1911, provided this Congress enacts into law the pending Senate bill to raise the President's salary to $100,000. Suppose, notwithstanding all this, President Taft nominates Senator KNOX for Secretary of State and the Senate confirms the nomination, and unfortunately both President Taft and Vice-President SHERMAN should die and Mr. Secretary of State KNOX should essay to act as President, notwithstanding his triple disqualification, and the Secretary of the Treasury, who stands next in line of the presidential succession, should institute ouster proceedings against him, as both his duty and his ambition would force him to do, we would have a fine kettle of fish, would we not? Such a state of affairs would be distracting, if not positively calamitous. No man can calculate the evil consequences of such a situation.

We can not rationally assume that neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor any other Cabinet officer in the line of succession would not institute ouster proceedings, for the glittering prize of the Presidency is very tempting to poor mortals.

Mr. Speaker, it will not do to try to sneer or shunt Senator KNOX's ineligibility to the Presidency out of this case, because you yourself gave it prominence when you referred these bills to make him eligible to the Secretaryship of State to the Committee on the Election of President and Vice-President. That was the only excuse you had for referring them to that committee instead of to the Committee on the Judiciary, to which they should have been referred.

The words of the Constitution which bar Senator KNOX have been frequently construed and always to uphold the bar. Only two or three need be cited here. Governor Kirkwood, of Iowa, was a United States Senator. He resigned to become Secretary of the Interior, which office he also resigned. After that he was nominated to be a tariff commissioner, an office created during the senatorial term for which he had been elected, but after he had resigned from the Senate. The question of his eligibility arose, and Attorney-General Brewster, a brilliant and eminent lawyer of the same political party as the President and Governor Kirkwood, held that Governor Kirkwood was ineligible.

During President Cleveland's second term, a few days before the end of a senatorial term for which Senator Ransom, of North Carolina, had been elected, our diplomatic representative to Mexico was promoted from minister to ambassador and the salary increased to $17,500. President Cleveland promptly nominated Senator Ransom for that post, and the Senate as promptly confirmed the nomination. The question of his eligibility was raised and the Attorney-General declared him ineligible during the senatorial term for which Senator Ransom had been elected. President Cleveland then waited till after the 4th of March of that year, when the senatorial term for which Senator Ransom had been elected expired, which expiration removed the bar, and reappointed Senator Ransom as ambassador to Mexico.

A few days before the close of the Fifty-seventh Congress a new district judgeship was created for Minnesota and Hon. Page Morris, then a Representative in Congress, aspired to the position, and the President was willing to appoint him; but the question of his eligibility was raised and referred to Hon. PHILANDER CHASE KNOX, of Pennsylvania, then Attorney-General, who held that Morris was ineligible until the term for which he was elected as a Representative in Congress had expired. Morris's term in Congress expired in a few days thereafter, whereupon he was nominated and the nomination was confirmed. So, Senator KNOX is estopped by his own construction of the Constitution from accepting the Secretaryship of State.

It is claimed here that because Senator Morrill, of Maine, was appointed Secretary of the Treasury and served in that office during the senatorial term for which he had been elected, and during which term the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury had been increased and the increase had also been repealed, constitutes a precedent. It does no such thing, because for some reason the question of his eligibility was never raised. Anyway it is a well-known fact that when a Senator or ex-Senator is nominated for any office the nomination is immediately confirmed without reference to any committee by reason of that mysterious custom called "senatorial courtesy," which overrides the Constitution, laws, and every other thing known among men.

I herewith incorporate a luminous editorial from the St. Louis Republic:

MR. KNOX AND THE CONSTITUTION.

A constitutional provision of such clarity that it may be understood by a child stands between PHILANDER C. KNOX and the position of Secretary of State, for which he has been selected by President-elect Taft. Senator KNOX was designed for the chief position because of his conspicuous fitness, and his acceptance was the cause of much satisfaction both to Mr. Taft and the country. But it is very plain that the Constitution forbids a Senator who has voted to increase the emoluments of that office from becoming the incumbent of it.

But—and the argument started immediately—a way will be found to avoid the provision of the Constitution. Mr. KNOX himself was very much disconcerted. His friends are most solicitous. The prevailing tone of the dispatches is that it is no problem which the constitutional experts, who should be called "constitutional sharps," may not solve. One suggestion is that the salary of the Secretary of State be reduced again to $8,000. Other suggestions will doubtless be offered.

There is evidenced neither a desire nor an intention to obey the Constitution. It is assumed that Mr. Taft will suggest a way of dodging the inhibition. If Mr. Taft does not abandon the appointment of Mr. KNOX he will miss a rare opportunity to demonstrate his respect for the fundamental law. When our Presidents and Presidents-elect, our Senators and Representatives, our political leaders and our newspapers all view a constitutional direction as something of so little value that it is merely an incentive for ingenious plans to avoid it, we have carried our disrespect for law to the limit of sufferance.

The Constitution becomes in fact what Mr. Roosevelt has sought to make it—a ridiculous collection of obsolete saws hatched in the brains of theorizing patriarchs. If Mr. KNOX is not the first to decline the office absolutely, we hope that Mr. Taft will promptly save him that trouble.

This attempt to render Senator KNOX eligible to the Secretaryship of State is not only unconstitutional, but is also preposterous.

Where do we leave ourselves if we pass this bill and pass the bill pending in the Senate? You will then have the preposterous situation of the Undersecretary of State—God save the mark! It is so English, don't you know—you will have the ridiculous situation of the Undersecretary of State drawing $10,000 a year and his superior officer, the Secretary of State, drawing only $8,000 a year. By passing this bill we are making ourselves the laughing stock of every intelligent man on the face of the earth, and you can not get away from that proposition. [Applause.]

I am not going to further argue the constitutional question, because I have not time, and it has been well done, anyway, by others. It is mere child's play, and there never has been but one case in the history of the United States where anybody undertook to change a constitution by a statute or a resolution, and that has been a standing joke ever since 1820. The Congress of the United States passed a resolution, the most ridiculous thing ever put into print, that Missouri should not be admitted into the Union until the legislature of Missouri, by "solemn ordinance"—whatever that may mean—should declare that a certain clause in the constitution of Missouri should never be put into effect!

The constitution of Missouri can not be changed except by a vote of the people, but Missourians were so anxious to get into the Union that they went through the preposterous farce of calling the legislature together and passing a "solemn ordinance" that that obnoxious clause of the constitution should never be put into effect, and then like men entered their solemn protest against the idiocy of the performance. That congressional resolution and that "solemn ordinance" constitute "the second Missouri compromise." It has always been stated that Henry Clay, author of that resolution in Congress which required the legislature of Missouri to do that ridiculous thing, always regarded it as the most stupendous joke of the age, and the great Kentuckian was correct. Now, here, after the lapse of nearly a hundred years, we are repeating that condemned performance by passing this act. I regret the thing has ever come up. I would not throw a straw in the way of Judge Taft and the success of his administration. I hope it will be successful until the 4th day of March, 1913, and I hope on that day at high noon he will retire from that high office in favor of a Democrat and spend many years in the enjoyment of his reputation as a political sage. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield whatever time I have remaining to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CAULFIELD].

Mr. CAULFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we are about to perpetrate a legislative absurdity. It is absurd to provide that the highest Cabinet officer, the Secretary of State, should receive the smallest salary. It is absurd after we have raised the salaries of all of the Cabinet officers, on the theory, I presume, that the expense of entertaining had increased, to now decrease the salary of the very office the duties of which really call for entertaining. It seems to me absurd after raising the salary on the theory that the best talent could not be obtained at $8,000 a year to now reduce the salary to that amount for the very purpose of getting what is assumed to be the best talent. [Applause.]

But the real spectacle for men is that of the American Congress sitting here and changing the law to meet the exigencies of a single person. I can not approve of that sort of legislation. It is unjustly said that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor. Let it not be justly said that the American Congress will change the law of the land for the benefit of only one man. I do not believe in that. It has been repeatedly said that the incoming administration shall be distinguished for its devotion to the law. I shall, indeed, feel disappointed if this is a sample of it, for it seems more like a sample of constitutional jugglery or, at least, legislative favoritism. [Applause.] I hope that we will vote down this bill and thereby say to the people that before the House of Representatives of the United States all men are equal. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I have seven minutes remaining, I think, and I will yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the proposition to order the previous question upon this rule, and voted against the adoption of the rule. I had nothing to do with bringing this bill before the House originally under the motion to suspend the rules and pass it. I have had nothing to do with bringing it before the House now. It is, however, before the House and is to be voted upon, and the question is whether one should vote aye or no upon it. That is a question which I think every gentleman shall have to settle for himself, and claiming for myself and exercising the same rights that everybody else has and everybody else exercises, I expect to vote for its passage, as I did when it was put upon its passage under the motion to suspend the rules.

As I said a little while ago, it appears to me that no constitutional question is involved. The question is one of propriety, about which I concede there may very well be differences of opinion. I have no fault to find and no quarrel with anyone who entertains a different opinion from that which has guided my vote upon this proposition. Much can be said against it and perhaps not much for it, though I think quite enough to warrant one in casting his vote upon that side. Suppose, for illustration, that Mr. Bryan had been elected President, and that Mr. Bryan had selected a Cabinet minister out of the Senate, and the same question of eligibility arose at the same time and in the same way, and that the same question of amending the salary act was now before the House. I think no one could doubt that I would vote in that instance, providing I could do it constitutionally, to let Mr. Bryan have in his Cabinet the man of his choice by the passage of such a measure as this.

The principle involved is precisely the same, no matter who is to be President, no matter who is to be Secretary of State. The question is one of legislative power and authority and of legislative propriety. If this question had arisen in the earlier days of this session, so that there would be abundant or even reasonable time within which to construct a Cabinet to the satisfaction of the incoming President, I would have voted against the passage of such a bill as this. I do not mean by this to say or to suggest that it is impossible to find in these United States or in either one of the great parties in it, soon or at once, a competent man for this office, or for any office; but the incoming President, having arranged his Cabinet and having selected the gentleman whom he desires to place at its head, it appears to me that we can safely vote to pass this bill in order to remove the obstruction which exists, and which, if the appointment were to be made now, would be insuperable against the placing of that gentleman in the Cabinet.

That may not be a very broad or a very statesmanlike view, but I think it is a liberal, human view, a natural view in treating questions as questions arise, and as this question is presented.

What particular principle that lies at the foundation of this Government, or that any of us need care to preserve, is involved in this legislation? In what particular will the spirit of the Constitution be disregarded or its letter be affected, or in what particular will there be, from the example, danger of an invasion of the constitutional rights of anybody or of the destruction of the constitutional guaranties of anybody? In my judgment, the issue has been magnified far beyond its real, inherent importance.

The question now is whether we shall pass this bill. If we do pass the bill, then when the 4th of March comes around and the time for the appointment of the Secretary of State arrives, there will not be upon the statute books or in force any law by which the emoluments of that office are in any degree increased.

And recurring to what I said before, the matter of time has nothing to do with the principle involved, so far as the power or right to enact this legislation goes. If the law had been upon the statute books a single day and had been repealed the next day, there would be just as much of inherent disqualification, if there be any inherent, ineradicable disqualification after the passage of this act. I take it when it comes to the appointment of a person to an office the question is as to his qualification at that time. The disqualification must be at the time of appointment; that the emoluments of the office, increased while he held the congressional office for a term not yet ended, remain increased at the time of the appointment. "Shall have been increased" carries the increase down to the time of the appointment. The thing to be guarded against, the evil to be met, is giving the appointee from Congress the increased salary or emoluments of office.

The legislation is peculiar and extraordinary. It is not necessary to admit that or to deny it. That is evident to anyone and everyone. It is a peculiar case, and the question of propriety is whether or not one is warranted or justified in voting for the passage of this bill in this peculiar case.

Now, what good would come from defeating it? What good could come from defeating it? In that event Senator KNOX could not be appointed to the Cabinet. What great policy would be advanced?

Mr. COCKRAN. Equality of the law.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Equality of the law? What is the equality of the law about which the gentleman talks? The equality of the law that existed before and that does not exist when you act or the equality of the law enforced at the time of the action when the law is to be tested and tried? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 178, noes 121.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon that question I demand the yeas and nays. [After a pause.] A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is this upon the third reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. This is upon the third reading of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I withdraw the demand.

So the bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon this question I ask for tellers.

Mr. DALZELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 173, nays 116, answered "present" 7, not voting 90, as follows:

STATEHOOD.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, by authority of the Committee on Territories, I move to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill H. R. 27891, known as the "statehood bill," to suspend the rules, and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, by authority of the Committee on Territories, moves to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill indicated, the so-called "statehood bill," to suspend the rules, and pass the same. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27891) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and state government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and state government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Be it enacted, etc., That the inhabitants of all that part of the area of the United States now constituting the Territory of New Mexico, as at present described, may become the State of New Mexico, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That all the qualified electors of said Territory are hereby authorized to vote for and choose delegates to form a convention for said Territory. The aforesaid convention shall consist of 100 delegates; and the governor, chief justice, and secretary of said Territory shall apportion the delegates to be thus elected, as nearly as may be, equitably among the several counties thereof in accordance with the voting population as shown by the vote cast at the election for Delegate in Congress in said Territory in 1908.

The governor of said Territory shall, within thirty days after the approval of this act, by proclamation in which the aforesaid apportionment of delegates to the convention shall be fully specified and announced, order an election of the delegates aforesaid in said Territory on a day designated by him in said proclamation, within sixty days after the approval of this act. Such election for delegates shall be conducted, the returns made, and the certificates of persons elected to such convention issued, as nearly as may be, in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said Territory regulating elections therein of members of the legislature; and the penal provisions of said laws are hereby made applicable to the election herein provided for; and said convention when so called to order and organized shall be the sole judge of the election and qualifications of its own members. Persons possessing the qualifications entitling them to vote at the aforesaid election of delegates shall be entitled to vote on the ratification or rejection of the constitution formed by said convention when said constitution shall be submitted to the people of said Territory hereunder, and on the election of all officials whose election is taking place at the same time, under such rules and regulations as said convention may prescribe, not in conflict with this act.

SEC. 3. That the delegates to the convention thus elected shall meet in the hall of the house of representatives in the capital of the Territory of New Mexico at 12 o'clock noon on the fourth Monday after their election, and they shall not receive compensation for more than sixty days of service; after organization they shall declare on behalf of the people of said proposed State that they adopt the Constitution of the United States, whereupon the said convention shall be, and is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and state government for said proposed State. The constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and shall not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence. And said convention shall provide by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State—

First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; and that polygamous or plural marriages and the sale, barter, or giving of intoxicating liquors to Indians are forever prohibited.

Second. That the people inhabiting said proposed State do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated and ungranted public lands lying within the boundaries thereof and to all lands lying within said limits owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes, except as hereinafter provided, and that until the title thereto shall have been extinguished by the United States the same shall be and remain subject to the disposition of the United States, and such Indian lands shall remain under the absolute jurisdiction and control of the Congress of the United States; that the lands and other property belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed at a higher rate than the lands and other property belonging to residents thereof; that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be acquired by the United States or reserved for its use; but nothing herein, or in the ordinance herein provided for, shall preclude the said State from taxing, as other lands and other property are taxed, any lands and other property outside of an Indian reservation owned or held by any Indian, save and except such lands as have been or may be granted to any Indian or Indians under any act of Congress containing a provision exempting the lands thus granted from taxation, but said ordinance shall provide that all such lands shall be exempt from taxation by said State so long and to such extent as such act of Congress may prescribe.

Third. That the debts and liabilities of said Territory of New Mexico shall be assumed and paid by said State, and that said State shall be subrogated to all the rights of indemnity and reimbursement which said Territory now has.

Fourth. That provision shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of a system of public schools, which shall be open to all the children of said State and free from sectarian control; and that said schools shall always be conducted in English: Provided, That nothing in this act shall preclude the teaching of other languages in said public schools.

Fifth. That said State shall never enact any law restricting or abridging the right of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and that ability to read, write, and speak the English language sufficiently well to conduct the duties of the office without the aid of an interpreter shall be a necessary qualification for all state officers.

Sixth. That the capital of said State shall temporarily be at the city of Santa Fe, in the present Territory of New Mexico, and shall not be changed therefrom previous to A. D. 1915, but the permanent location of said capital may, after said year, be fixed by the electors of said State, voting at an election to be provided for by the legislature.

Seventh. That the State shall grant to the United States Government all rights and powers relating thereto necessary for the carrying out of the provisions by it of the act of Congress entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands," approved June 17, 1902, and acts amendatory thereof, to the same extent as if said State had remained a Territory.

SEC. 4. That in case a constitution and state government shall be formed in compliance with the provisions of this act, the convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said proposed State for its ratification or rejection, at an election which shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November after the adjournment of the convention, at which election the qualified voters of said proposed State shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution and for or against any provisions thereof separately submitted. The returns of said election shall be made by the election officers direct to the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico at Santa Fe; who, with the governor and chief justice of said Territory, shall constitute a canvassing board, and they, or any two of them, shall meet at said city of Santa Fe on the third Monday after said election and shall canvass the same; and if a majority of the legal votes cast on that question shall be for the constitution, the said canvassing board shall certify the result to the President of the United States, together with the statement of the votes cast thereon, and upon separate articles or propositions, and a copy of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances. And if the constitution and government of said proposed State are republican in form and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and if the provisions in this act have been complied with in the formation thereof, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, within twenty days from the receipt of the certificate of the result of said election and the statement of the votes cast thereon and a copy of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances from said board, to issue his proclamation announcing the result of said election, and thereupon the proposed State shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union, under and by virtue of this act, under the name of New Mexico, on an equal footing with the original States, from and after the date of said proclamation.

The original of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances, and the election returns, and a copy of the statement of the votes cast at said election, shall be forwarded and turned over by the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico to the state authorities.

SEC. 5. That until the next general census, or until otherwise provided by law, said State shall be entitled to two Representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States, to be elected at large from said State, which Representatives, together with the governor and other officers provided for in said constitution, shall be elected on the same day of the election for the adoption of the constitution; and until said state officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution and the State is admitted into the Union the territorial officers of said Territory, including Delegate to Congress, shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices in said Territory until their successors are duly elected and qualified.

SEC. 6. That in addition to sections 16 and 36, heretofore granted to the Territory of New Mexico, sections 2 and 32 are hereby granted to the said State for the support of common schools, and where sections 2, 16, 32, and 36, or any parts thereof, are mineral, or have been sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress, other lands equivalent thereto in acreage are hereby granted to the said State for the support of common schools: Provided, That any such sections 2, 16, 32, and 36, or parts thereof, embraced in any Indian, military, or other reservations, except national forests, at the date of the passage of this act, or prior to the survey of said sections, shall not be subject to this grant, but other lands of equal area are hereby granted to be selected for school purposes in lieu thereof. And the Secretary of the Interior, without awaiting the extension of the public surveys, shall ascertain and determine, by protraction or otherwise, the area of said sections 2, 16, 32, and 36 included within such Indian, military, or other reservations, including national forests, and shall certify to the State the area thus determined, whereupon the State shall be entitled to select indemnity lands to the extent of the area thus certified: And provided, That the grants of sections 2, 16, 32, and 36 to said State within national forests now existing or proclaimed before identification of said sections by survey shall not vest the title to said sections in said State until the part of said national forests embracing any of said sections is restored to the public domain, but in the meantime said State shall have the option of making indemnity selections for any or all of said sections or of leaving any or all of them to remain a part of the respective national forests; and said sections so left in national forests shall be administered as a part of said forests, but at the close of each fiscal year there shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State as income for its common-school fund 20 per cent of the gross proceeds of all the national forests within said State, said 20 per cent, however, to be reduced at the end of each fiscal year in proportion to the reduction of the area of said sections originally in national forests, by all indemnity selections which may have been made by the State for said sections in said forests prior to the close of the respective fiscal years, the area of said sections when unsurveyed to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, by protraction or otherwise, the amount necessary for such payments being hereby appropriated and made available annually from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 7. That where settlement with a view to preemption or homestead, or improvement with a view to desert-land entry, made heretofore or hereafter, before the survey of the lands in the field, are found to have been made on sections 2, 16, 32, or 36, those sections or portions thereof settled upon or improved shall be subject to the claims of such settlers or desert-land claimants who have otherwise complied with the requirements of the preemption, homestead, and desert-land acts, respectively, and other lands of equal acreage are hereby granted in lieu thereof. And other lands are hereby granted to and may be selected by said State as indemnity whereupon survey sections 2, 16, 32, and 36 are found to be entirely wanting or fractional in quantity by reason of the township being fractional, or from any natural cause whatever, except that the area of such indemnity selection right in any such fractional township shall not in any event exceed an area which, when added to the area of the above-named sections returned by the survey as in place, will equal four sections for fractional townships containing 17,280 acres or more, three sections for such townships containing 11,520 acres or more, two sections for such townships containing 5,760 acres or more, nor one section for such townships containing 640 acres or more.

SEC. 8. That in lieu of the grant of land for purposes of internal improvements made to new States by the eighth section of the act of September 4, 1841, which section is hereby repealed as to the proposed State, and in lieu of any claim or demand by said State under the act of September 28, 1850, and section 2479 of the Revised Statutes, making a grant of swamp and overflowed lands to certain States, which grant it is hereby declared is not extended to the said State, and in lieu of the grant of saline lands heretofore made to the Territory of New Mexico for university purposes by section 3 of the act of June 21, 1898, which is hereby repealed except as to such portions of such saline lands as may have been selected by said Territory prior to the passage of this act, the following grants of land are hereby made, to wit:

For university purposes, 54,400 acres; for legislative, executive, and judicial public buildings heretofore erected in said Territory or to be hereafter erected in the State, and for the payment of the bonds heretofore or hereafter issued therefor, 96,000 acres; for insane asylums, 100,000 acres; for penitentiaries, 100,000 acres; for schools and asylums for the deaf, dumb, and the blind, 100,000 acres; for miners' hospitals for disabled miners, 50,000 acres; for normal schools, 200,000 acres; for state charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions, 100,000 acres; for agricultural and mechanical colleges, 150,000 acres; and the national appropriation heretofore annually paid for the agricultural and mechanical college to said Territory shall, until further order of Congress, continue to be paid to said State for the use of said institution; for school of mines, 100,000 acres; for military institutes, 100,000 acres; and for the payment of the debts of said Territory and of such valid county and other public debts existing at the date of the approval of this act as said Territory may have assumed or said State shall assume, 3,000,000 acres: Provided, That if there shall remain any of the 3,000,000 acres of land so granted, or of the proceeds of the sale or lease thereof, or rents, issues, or other profits therefrom, after the payment of said debts, such remainder of lands and the proceeds of sales thereof shall be added to and become a part of the permanent school fund of said State, the income therefrom only to be used for the maintenance of the common schools of said State.

SEC. 9. That the schools, colleges, and universities provided for in this act shall forever remain under the exclusive control of the said State, and no part of the proceeds arising from the sale or disposal of any lands granted herein for educational purposes shall be used for the support of any sectarian or denominational school, college, or university.

SEC. 10. That 5 per cent of the proceeds of sales of public lands lying within said State, which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union after deducting all the expenses incident to such sales, shall be paid to the said State to be used as a permanent inviolable fund, the interest of which only shall be expended for the support of the common schools within said State.

SEC. 11. That all lands herein or heretofore granted for educational purposes shall be disposed of, at public sale only, for a price not less than $5 per acre as to all such lands east of the one hundred and fifth meridian of longitude nor less than $3 per acre for such land west of said meridian, the proceeds of such sales to constitute a permanent fund, any portion of which, if lost for any reason, shall be replaced by appropriation from the treasury of the State, and the income from which only shall be expended for the improvement, maintenance, and support of the respective educational institutions; but pending sale said lands may be leased as the state legislature shall prescribe; and all lands herein or heretofore granted for purposes other than educational shall be disposed of as the legislature of said State may prescribe.

SEC. 12. That all lands granted in quantity, or as indemnity, by this act shall be selected under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior from the unreserved, unappropriated, and nonmineral public lands of the United States within the limits of said State by a commission composed of the governor, surveyor-general, or other officer exercising the functions of a surveyor-general, and attorney-general of the said State; and the fees to be paid to the register and receiver collectively for each final location or selection of 160 acres made hereunder shall be $1: Provided, That if the above commission selects any tract of unsurveyed land it shall determine the exterior boundaries thereof and file with the Department of the Interior a map and description of such boundaries by metes and bounds or otherwise, and the filing of such selection map and description shall operate to defeat any right within said area sought to be initiated thereafter by location, settlement, or improvement under any but the mineral-land laws; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be used by the Secretary of the Interior for such examination and survey of said land as he may deem necessary for purposes of patenting the land so selected to the State.

SEC. 13. That all grants of lands heretofore made by any act of Congress to said Territory, except to the extent modified or repealed by this act, are hereby ratified and confirmed in and to said State.

SEC. 14. That the said State, when admitted as aforesaid, shall constitute one judicial district, and the circuit and district courts of said district shall be held at the capital of said State, or at such other place or places as the court itself may designate, and the said district shall, for judicial purposes, be attached to the eighth judicial circuit. There shall be appointed for said district one district judge, one United States attorney, and one United States marshal. The judge of said district shall receive a yearly salary the same as other similar judges of the United States, payable as provided for by law, and shall reside in the district to which he is appointed. There shall be appointed clerks of said courts, who shall keep their offices at the capital of said State. The regular terms of said courts shall be held in said district, at the place or places aforesaid, on the first Monday in April and the first Monday in October of each year, and one grand jury shall be summoned in each year in each of said circuit and district courts. The circuit and district courts for said district, and the judges thereof, respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction and perform the same duties required to be performed by the other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations. The marshal, district attorney, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of said district, and all other officers and persons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall, for the services they may perform, receive the fees and compensation now allowed by law to officers performing similar services for the United States in the Territory of New Mexico.

SEC. 15. And said convention shall provide, by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State—

First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; and that polygamous or plural marriages and the sale, barter, or giving of intoxicating liquors to Indians are forever prohibited.

Second. That the people inhabiting said proposed State do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated and ungranted public lands lying within the boundaries thereof and to all lands lying within said limits owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes, except as hereinafter provided, and that until the title thereto shall have been extinguished by the United States the same shall be and remain subject to the disposition of the United States, and such Indian lands shall remain under the absolute jurisdiction and control of the Congress of the United States; that the lands and other property belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed at a higher rate than the lands and other property belonging to residents thereof; that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be acquired by the United States or reserved for its use; but nothing herein, or in the ordinance herein provided for, shall preclude the said State from taxing, as other lands and other property are taxed, any lands and other property, outside of an Indian reservation, owned or held by any Indian, save and except such lands as have been or may be granted to any Indian or Indians under any act of Congress containing a provision exempting the lands thus granted from taxation, but said ordinance shall provide that all such lands shall be exempt from taxation by said State so long and to such extent as such act of Congress may prescribe.

Third. That the debts and liabilities of said Territory of Arizona shall be assumed and paid by said State, and that said State shall be subrogated to all the rights of indemnity and reimbursement which said Territory now has.

That said State shall never enact any law restricting or abridging the right of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and that ability to read, write, and speak the English language sufficiently well to conduct the duties of the office without the aid of an interpreter shall be a necessary qualification for all state officers.

Sixth. That the capital of said State shall temporarily be at the city of Phoenix, in the present Territory of Arizona, and shall not be changed therefrom previous to A. D. 1915, but the permanent location of said capital may, after said year, be fixed by the electors of said State, voting at an election to be provided for by the legislature.

Seventh. That the State shall grant to the United States Government all rights and powers relating thereto necessary for the carrying out of the provisions by it of the act of Congress entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands," approved June 17, 1902, and acts amendatory thereof, to the same extent as if said State had remained a Territory.

SEC. 22. That in case a constitution and state government shall be formed in compliance with the provisions of this act, the convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said proposed State for its ratification or rejection, at an election which shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November after the adjournment of the convention, at which election the qualified voters of said proposed State shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution and for or against any provisions thereof separately submitted. The returns of said election shall be made by the election officers direct to the secretary of the Territory of Arizona at Phoenix; who, with the governor and chief justice of said Territory, shall constitute a canvassing board, and they, or any two of them, shall meet at said city of Phoenix on the third Monday after said election and shall canvass the same; and if a majority of the legal votes cast on that question shall be for the constitution the said canvassing board shall certify the result to the President of the United States, together with the statement of the votes cast thereon, and upon separate articles or propositions, and a copy of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances. And if the constitution and government of said proposed State are republican in form, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and if the provisions in this act have been complied with in the formation thereof, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, within twenty days from the receipt of the certificate of the result of said election and the statement of the votes cast thereon and a copy of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances from said board, to issue his proclamation announcing the result of said election, and thereupon the proposed State shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union, under and by virtue of this act, under the name of Arizona, on an equal footing with the original States, from and after the date of said proclamation.

The original of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances, and the election returns, and a copy of the statement of the votes cast at said election shall be forwarded and turned over by the secretary of the Territory of Arizona to the state authorities.

SEC. 23. That until the next general census, or until otherwise provided by law, said State shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, which Representative, together with the governor and other officers provided for in said constitution, shall be elected on the same day of the election for the adoption of the constitution; and until said state officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution, and the State is admitted into the Union, the territorial officers of said Territory, including Delegates to Congress, shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices in said Territory until their successors are duly elected and qualified.

SEC. 24. That in addition to sections 16 and 36, heretofore reserved for the Territory of Arizona, sections 2 and 32 are hereby granted to the said State for the support of common schools, and where sections 2, 16, 32, and 36, or any parts thereof, are mineral, or have been sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress, other lands equivalent thereto in acreage are hereby granted to the said State for the support of common schools: Provided, That any such sections 2, 16, 32, and 36, or parts thereof, embraced in any Indian, military, or other reservations, except national forests, at the date of the passage of this act, or prior to the survey of said sections, shall not be subject to this grant, but other lands of equal area are hereby granted to be selected for school purposes in lieu thereof. And the Secretary of the Interior, without awaiting the extension of the public surveys, shall ascertain and determine, by protraction or otherwise, the area of said sections 2, 16, 32, and 36 included within such Indian, military, or other reservations, including national forests, and shall certify to the State the area thus determined, whereupon the State shall be entitled to select indemnity lands to the extent of the area thus certified: And provided, That the grants of sections 2, 16, 32, and 36 to said State within national forests now existing or proclaimed before identification of said sections by survey shall not vest the title to said sections in said State until the part of said national forests embracing any of said sections is restored to the public domain, but in the meantime said State shall have the option of making indemnity selections for any or all of said sections or of leaving any or all of them to remain a part of the respective national forests; and said sections so left in national forests shall be administered as a part of said forests, but at the close of each fiscal year there shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State as income for its common-school fund 20 per cent of the gross proceeds of all the national forests within said State, said 20 per cent, however, to be reduced at the end of each fiscal year in proportion to the reduction of the area of said sections originally in national forests by all indemnity selections which may have been made by the State for said sections in said forests prior to the close of the respective fiscal years, the area of said sections when unsurveyed to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior by protraction or otherwise, the amount necessary for such payments being hereby appropriated and made available annually from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 25. That where settlement with a view to preemption or homestead, or improvement with a view to desert-land entry, made heretofore or hereafter before survey, are found to have been made on sections 2, 16, 32, or 36, those sections or the portions thereof settled upon or improved shall be subject to the claims of such settlers or desert-land claimants who have otherwise complied with the requirements of the preemption, homestead, and desert-land acts, respectively, and other lands of equal acreage are hereby granted in lieu thereof. And other lands are hereby granted to and may be selected by said State as indemnity where upon survey sections 2, 16, 32, and 36 are found to be entirely wanting or fractional in quantity by reason of the township being fractional, or from any natural cause whatever, except that the area of such indemnity selection right in any such fractional township shall not in any event exceed an area which when added to the area of the above-named sections returned by the survey as in place will equal four sections for fractional townships containing 17,280 acres or more, three sections for such townships containing 11,520 acres or more, two sections for such townships containing 5,760 acres or more, nor one section for such townships containing 640 acres or more.

SEC. 26. That in lieu of the grant of land for purposes of internal improvements made to new States by the eighth section of the act of September 4, 1841, which section is hereby repealed as to the proposed State, and in lieu of any claim or demand by said State under the act of September 28, 1850, and section 2479 of the Revised Statutes, making a grant of swamp and overflowed lands to certain States, which grant it is hereby declared as not extended to the said State, the following grants of land are hereby made, to wit:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to ask the Chair whether or not, under a motion to suspend all rules, the reading of the bill is required? How can the reading be demanded if all rules are suspended, even the rule requiring the reading of the bill?
